At the close of the season, the members of the Chicago Club add ten per cent to all caddies' savings account as shown on their pass book of one of the local banks. The pass books will be inspected by Mr. Roe, caddy master, on Friday of this week, and the boys are requested to turn in their pass books by that date. The pass book must show that deposits have been made regularly throughout the season, and the amount deposited will be compared with the total amount earned by the depositor during the season.

The annual caddies' tournament will get under way this week with qualifying rounds to be played on September 1st, 2nd and 3rd. Prizes are awarded as follows: To the winner in the first flight, $10.00; to the runner-up, $5.00; to the winner of the second flight, $5.00; to the runner-up $3.00. Results of the tournament will be published next week.

WHY FRED W. GREEN SHOULD BE NEXT GOVERNOR

1. He knows the needs of big business for he has taken hold of a small business and made it big. The Ypsilanti Reed Furniture factory is ona of the most successful furnlture factories in Michigan.

2. He knows the needs of every town in Michigan. He was born in a small town, raised in a small town, and has made Ionia one of the best known cities in Michigan.

3. He knows tha needs of the state in the matter of conservation. He is a hunter and fisherman, with a wide knowledge of all the great open spaces of Michigan which are suffering from the lack of a consistent and a persistent program of conservation.

4. He knows the needs of the boys and girls of Michigan. He is the constant companion of his daughter, Peggy, and his love of boys is reflected in his Boy Scout work, of which Ionia is justly proud. His great love and sympathy for childhood will make him eminently qualified to supervise Michigan's educational and correctional institutions.

He knows the need of a bigger and better Republican organization in every voting precinct of Michigan. He believes men and women should work together in evolving a system whereby citizens of the highest qualifications can be induced to run for public office. Instead of drafting good men for office, he believes good citizenship demands that the best men nnd women make the sacrifice to offer themselves as candidates. If elected governor, he will lend the weight of his influence toward placing the burden directly where it belongs—on the shoulders of the good men and women of Michigan.

M. E. CONFERENCE MEETS SEPT. 8

7-DAY SESSION TO BE HELD AT TRAVERSE CITY

Charlevoix Will Be Represented by Rev. Pollock and Frank F. Bird, Delegate

The Michigan annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church will meet in Traverse City next Wednesday, September the 8th, the session lasting one week.

During this week the six hundred or more Methodist Episcopal churches of western Michigan will make reports of their year's work, hundreds of thousands of dollars will be accounted for and the business affairs of a conference involving millions of dollnrs will all be audited for the yenr. In addition the characters and labors of the four hundred Methodist Eiscopal ministers of the Michigan annual conference will be investigated and passed upon, new ministers will be examined regarding their call and qualifications to preach, and the new year's work will be outlined for the ministers of the conference. The final work of the session will be the appointment of the ministers to their new year's work.

Bishop Thomas Nicholson of Detroit, will be the president of the conference. Frank Bird will represent the interests of the local church at the layman's conference which meets on Friday, September 10th in conjunitioa with the conferenee of the ministers.

WORK ON NEW LANDING SLIPS GOING FORWARD

Sheet-Piling Completed—Docks Now Under Coostruction

Work on the new city docks is progressing rapidly under the direction of Roe Brothers of Harbor Springs.

A casual glance will show that a very neat job of sheet-piling has been completed and piles for two slips already driven and timbera partly laid. The dock in the southeast corner is completed and the work as a whole is progressing satisfactorily.

Next season Charlevoix will be able to point with pride to the new docks and ths beautiful park which will surround them.

DEPOSITS SHOW A STEADY INCREASE

County Bank Reached Its Peak During Present Season

The interest in the Charlevoix County Bank of the late Archibald Buttars has recently been sold to Albert F. Bridge, Robert Bridge, and Clarence N. Bridge.

The presidency of the bank formerly held by Mr. Buttars is now to be filled by Albert F. Bridge, who for the past twenty years has served as vice president and cashier. Robert Bridge will succeed his father as cashier. George Beeman will continue as nssistant cashier.

The bank has shown a steady and healthy growth over a period of years and at the peak of the aeaaon this year shows total reaources of over $925,000.00.

LABOR DAY PICNIC AT WHITING PARK

COMMITTEE MET IN CHARLEVOIX MONDAY EVENING

Fine Program of Sports Now Being Arranged—Basket Picnic aod Day of Fun

At a meeting of the Labor Day pic associntion, held last Monday evening in Charlevoix, committees were appointed and arrangements for the annual picnie at Whiting county park, to be held next Monday, September 6, were gotten under way.

Boyne City was represented by W. H. Whlte, C. T. McCutcheon, John Parker, Wm. Vought, I. C. Howell, B. C. Mellencamp and Frank Wangeman; East Jordan by Richard Supernaw, A. E. Wells, R. G. Watson and Peter Bulow, and Charlevoix by Larry Chase, George Beeman nnd Dr. W. W. Mitchell.

The Whiting Park committee guarnnteed $100.00 and an additional $200.00 was to be rnised in the three clties of the county to carry out the program nnd cover expenses.

Proposed features of the program which has not as yet been fully arranged ure band music, inter-city baseball games, potnto race, sack race, and other athletic sports which usually go along with an affair of this nature. Free coffee nnd cream will be furnished nnd each individual will furnish his own basket dinner.

Senator Wm. J. Pearson of Boyne Falls will act as chairman of the day. East Jordan delegates will compose the committee to furnish entertainment, Dr. W. W. Mitchell of this city will head the committee on sports, and F. F. Howell of Boyne City will head the committee to provide entertainment for the picnic. Prominent speakers will be present and nddress the gathering and the day will be one of entertainment and fun.

This event is the big get-to-gether meeting of the year of all residents of Charlevoix county, visitors from outside being welcomed. Friends will renew acquaintsnces, new friendships formed, and the result will be a better feeling among those who should be interested in the development of the community. Plan to be there.

BAND CONCERT ATTENDED BY LARGE NUMBER

Next Concert at East Jordan, Sunday September 5

The band concert held last Sunday afternoon at the Charlevoix auto park was one of the most successful yet held and was probably attended by the largest crowd ever present at any like affair in the city.

Charlevoix band members, assisted by players from East Jordan and Boyne City, made an organization of 32 pieces, and the fine program of music was heartily applauded by the large audience which filled the auto park. All available parking space near the auto park was crowded witb automobiles and cars were parked as far buck as the entrance to the city park.

The next co-operative concert will be held at East Jordan, next Sunday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock, at tbe city band stand. Residents from all parts of the county are urged to attend.

DAIRY SHOW TO DRAW MANY

CHARLEVOIXIANS AND OTHERS TO GO TO DETROIT

Event Is One of Major Importance to Michigan—Mellencamp Has Tickets on Sale

Charlevoix and northern Michigan farmera are planning to go to Detroit in early October for the National Dairy show, which is attracting much attention from dairy interests of the nation. B. C. Mellencamp, county agricultural agent, hus tickets on sale for the show, the price belng 50 cents or three tickets for one dollar.

Parking space is being allottted to those who will drive down from northern eountles and full information about this and other little items of big importance will be ready for interested persons within a few days. Mr. Mellencamp will have full information.

Prof. O. E. Reed, of the dairy department of Michigan State College, has issued the following bulletin about the show:

East Lansing, Mich., August 24.—The dairy interests of Michigan have for many years cherished the hope that some time the National Dairy Exposition would be staged in the state of Michigan. This hope is now to be realized for the National is to be held in Detroit, October 6th to 13th, 1926.

The reason for the keen desire to have this exposition in our state is that we believe the show performs a function in the educational field which is not to be obtained in any other way.

Breeders and dairymen will have an opportunity this fall to see the best individual animals of the five leading dairy breeds. This show is commonly called the "court of last resort" because it is the show at which this country and Canada are brought together to battle for the prize of prizes.

Those who attend the exposition and make a thorough study of the exhibits will come away with a greater vision of their industry and will be able truly to realize the greatness of dairying. There will be something at this show that will hold the interest, of everyone connected with the industry.

The health food show, showing the place and importance of the products of the dairy cow in relation to other foods in the national diet, will mako a lasting and more appreciative impression upon those who attend. The forage crops exhibit, showing the possibilities of the home grown rations and their relation to income from the farm will carry a lesson that few have ever had.

This is a great national exposition, set up at tremendous expense to the industry, and offers an opportunity for Michigan dairymen to get an excellent lesson about their greatest industry. Time, a little expense, and a receptive attitude are all that will be required on the part of the individual dairyman to get a message in show and story of his own business that will go a long way toward help him work out his every day problems.

HORTICULTURAL EXHIBIT FROM STATE COLLEGE

Unusual Display to Be Made at the Couoty Fair

It is of great interest to Fair officials and patrons of the Charlevoix County Fnir to know that Michigan Stnte college of East Lansing, Mich., will display a horticultural exhibit at our Fair, September 14, 15, 16.

Two or more state men will accompany this exhibit, and will explain the development and control of the many fruit diseases. Education along this line will be of great value to our fruit growers.

We are very much pleased that the state is able to send us a display of this kind, as it will mean a great deal to our county, and it is earnestly hoped that all will take advantage of the opportunity to acquaint themselves with this form of extension work from our Michigan State college.

There will also be posters displayed at various places on the fair grounds explaining the different short courses offered at Michigan State College of Agrieulture and Applied Science.

IRONTON FERRY HAS BUSY TIME

WILL CARRY 5,000 AUTOS OVER PINE LAKE THIS MONTH

New Craft Commanded by Samuel Alexander, Who Has Served Twenty-three Years

The new ferry for autos and passengers which bridges the gap in the Charlevoix-Boyne City section of the drive around Pine lake, is doing a thriving business, and it is estimated that it will transport 5,000 cars during the month of August. In one day this season it handled 500.

The boat is named the Charlevoix, is 24x50 feet, of steel construction and has a capacity of six ears. It was built at Ferrysburg and was towed up Lake Michigan to Pine lake. It is maintained by Charlevoix county, and the total cost of ferry and docks was $15,000.

There is a continuous 24 hour serviee excepting midnight and 4 a. m. when trips are made hourly. The craft is modern in every respect, being equipped with a Diesel oil-burning engine and other up-to-date accessories. It has a displacement of 37 gross tons and the engine is of 45 horsepower.

Samuel Alexander is in command, and has operated a ferry at that point for the last 23 years, and has built up a well deserved business through courteous treatment, and is known to tourists from one end of the country to the other. His assistants are his son, Ross Alexander, and Lyle Wangeman.

The Ironton ferry, as it called, was started in 1882 by a man named Bedwin who began business with a small row boat. There were no autos in those days, but tourists already had discovered that northern Michigan was an ideal summer resort section. Later Bedwin enlarged his business with a scow and then eame the ferry Eveline, which has been suceeeded by the Charlevoix.

LELAND WON BELVEDERE TOURNEY

PARKER AND SCHILLING TOOK MEN'S DOUBLES

Mrs. Long Won Women's Singles Handily, Showing Real Form —Event Very Successful

The nnnual Belvedere tennis tournament whlch ended last week, proved n highly enjoyable event and developed some fair tennis. Seven events were contested, Austin Leland winning the men's singles handily in straight sets.

The men's doubles went to W. G. Parker and John Schilling after an exciting match with Hawkins and Peugnet, 8-6, 8-6, 6-4. Parker did not play in the singles, but was steady in doubles, many of his skyrocket lobs landing on the base line and bounding over the fenee. The losers were within a point of winning the first set, and had the sceond set 5-4, 40 love, only to lose.

Mrs. Mary Shreve Long, famous player from the sunny southland, and winner of 50 tournaments, showed her class by winning three matches to take the women's singles with the loss of only two games. It is regretted that Mrs. Long did not enter the Inn tournament and face Mrs. Riese. An effort will be mnde to bring these two together next year.

Mrs. Long and Mr. Leland captured the mixed doubles, proving easy winners over Mr. and Mrs. B. Randel of the Chicago Club, 6-2, 6-1.

Richard "Buddy" Clark landed the junior singles nfter several hairbreadth escapes. He also won the junior doubles with Clark Barbour, defeating Connett and Valier in a desperate final of five sets.

Stewart Smith proved the ultimate victor over Bill Talmon in the junior consolntion event. The final match also went the limit of five sets.

Exceptionally beautiful eups were donnted by the Belvedere association. They were presented to the winners Saturday night and are now being appropriately engraved.

AUTO LICENSES AT HALF PRICE AFTER SEPT. 1st

Commencing Wednesday, (today) September 1st, 1926, license plates will be sold for one-half of the usual tax, according to information from County Clerk Emrey's office. This is in accordance with the practice as stated in section 9, in the compiled laws of 1915. The date of the sale of the 1927 plates has not yet been designated, although December has usually been named as the month. An increase in the number of plates issued through the local office this year over the number sold in a corresponding period in 1925, is noted. This year, 2,431 plates have been sold to date in comparison to 2,462 tags for the whole of last year. Sales from September to Janunry will bring the total year's sales for 1926 considerably over that of 1925.

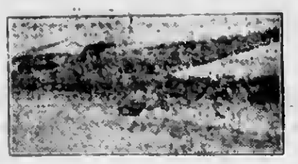
Why I'm going to the Greater
MICHIGAN STATE FAIR

By Cousin Joe

ALL READY FOR THE FAIR!

Well, I'm just about ready for the Fair. Been looking forward to going all summer. It starts on the 5th and lasts through the 11th. Auto races on the last day. I'll look forward to seeing you there, too. We'll sure have a good time and see a lot of fine things. I had a surprise today. Jim Purdy brought back a corn planter he borrowed from me last spring. Jim's always helping me wear out my farm tools. "All ready for the Fair?" asks Jim, as we were pushing the planter into the shed. "Yes," I sort of bubbles over, "I'm all ready for the Fair. My wife's got a new dress. I've got a new tie. Her cousin, Cherry, that's going with us has a new hat. And Jim," I says, chuckling to myself, "if you'll only bring back those auto tools you borrowed from me yesterday, we can get started first thing Monday morning!"



PROGRESS OF THE GREATER MICHIGAN STATE FAIR

Auto racing will be one of the thrills of Fair Week Sept. 5th to 11th. Arrangements have been made with railroads, interurbans and busses to handle the largest crowd in Fair's history. Arrangements have been made to get crowds by the easiest routes and

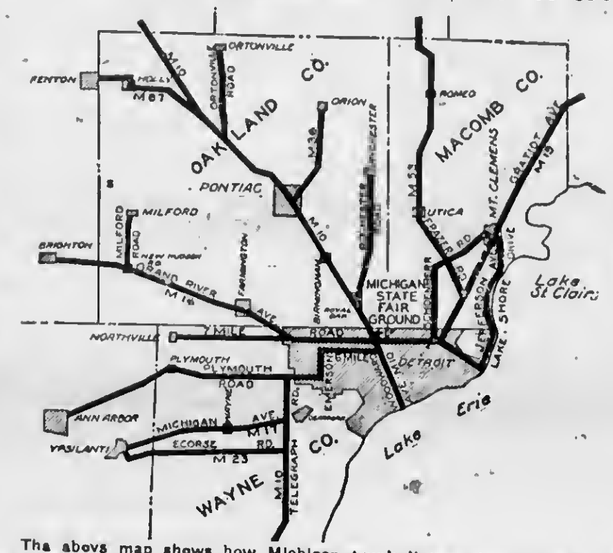
Road Guide To State Fair



The above map shows how Michigan trunk line roads come into the Detroit area, and how to reach the State Fair grounds without entering the city's heavy traffic districts. By crossing the Six or Seven-Mile Road to Woodward Avenue, motorists, coming from any direction can reach the grounds easily without going "down town" at all. (Map drawn by State Highway Department.)

NAME BEST ROUTES TO REACH DETROIT

GOOD ROADS AVAILABLE FOR MOTORISTS FROM ANY PART OF STATE

Best road routings to reach the State Fair at Detroit from any section of Michigan have been prepared by the state highway department.

By following these road directions to the point where the routes join the highway system in the Detroit area, motorists from any part of the state will have an easy, comfortable ride to the big exposition, from September 5 to 11.

Special State Fair markers have been installed on the highways to make it still easier for visitors to reach the fair grounds. Arrows have been painted on the pavement in the Detroit district, marking the turns to the fair grounds. Metal signs are also being posted at all turns where a doubt might arise as to the proper route.

Thousands of visitors from all over the state are expected to drive to Detroit for the Fair this year. Ease with which the motorist can avoid the heavy city traffic in getting to the fair grounds, and the generally good condition of state roads combine to make the trip an attractive one.

Definite routes are recommended by the Highway Department as follows:

Northwestern Michigan

From Elmira north follow M-13 to Elmira; M-32 Elmira to Gaylord; M-14 Gaylord to Lansing; M-16 to Detroit.

From Beulah, Manistee, Ludington, Pentwater and Shelby, follow M-11 to Grand Haven; M-16 Grand Haven to Detroit.

NEW FAIR BUILDING TELLS FARM STORY

A story of Michigan farm life, covered from all angles, will be told in the exhibits at the new agricultural building on the State Fair Grounds, September 5 to 11.

Final check of the organizations and groups which will exhibit in this newest unit of the State Fair equipment, shows that all leading farm interests of the state will be represented. The result, according to Prof. J. F. Cox of the Michigan State College, who is chairman of the agricultural committee of the fair board, will be the most complete story of Michigan farms ever told in exhibit form.

Among the groups which are completing their exhibits this week are: Michigan Farm Bureau, the Grange, the Gleaners, the Michigan State College, the State Department of Agriculture, the Upper Peninsula, the State Crop Improvement Association, the Conners Association, the Detroit Market Gardeners Association, the Michigan Florists Association, and the agricultural press of the state.

Competitive exhibits in horticulture and crops will also be housed in this building, which is said to be the largest agricultural exhibit building in the world.

FAIR VISITORS WILL CAMP IN STATE PARKS

Michigan state parks near Detroit will be used as camp grounds by many of those who drive to the State Fair at Detroit from September 5 to 11, according to P. J. Hoffmaster, superintendent of parks.

Those who tour to Detroit for the Fair, and who wish to camp out on the trip, will find the parks of great convenience. Several of them are within driving distance of an hour or so from the Fair Grounds.

Among the state parks within easy reach of Detroit are: Island Lake State Park, near Brighton on M-16; Dodge Brothers State Park, one-half mile off Woodward Ave., near Birmingham; Bloomer State Park No. 2, one and one-half miles southeast of Rochester, at the head of John R. street; Dodge Brothers State Park, six miles south of Utica, near Gratiot avenue.

SPECIAL DAYS MARK STATE FAIR PROGRAM

Special days, on each of which added attention will be given to the groups honored on that day, have been designated for the State Fair.

All of the entertainment and educational program of the big exposition will, of course, run right through the week, but extra features will be planned for the special days.

Monday, September 6, is to be Labor Day; Tuesday, Children's Day; Wednesday, Fraternal Day; Thursday, Farmers' Day; Friday, Detroit Day, and Saturday, Automobile Day.

Big time horse races are booked for afternoons from Monday through Friday, with brilliant A. A. A. automobile racing on Saturday afternoon, September 11, the last day of the fair.

Although the exact state of road improvement in the United States at the present time is not known, it is estimated by the Department of Agriculture that the total mileage of surfaced roads at the end of 1924 was between 450,000 and 475,000 miles.

A MAN OF ACTION

If Dr. Frank Bohn of Newberry, now running for congress, will promise to make only half as good a record in Washington as he already has in the State Senate, he is entitled to the hearty support of every voter in Schoolcraft county. Dr. Bohn has really done something for his district. We owe the state ferries at the straits to him, and every resident of the Upper Peninsula who remembers former conditions at the straits knows what a benefit these state ferries have been to the tourist business.

Dr. Bohn is also responsible for the Bohn school bill which provides that five per cent of the primary money shall be distributed to the poorer counties of the state which will be a great benefit to counties like Schoolcraft where there are more children in proportion to the valuation than the average for the state. The fact that the city of Detroit is fighting his bill should rally the voters in Bohn's district to his support.

It did not take Bohn long to make a place for himself in the State Senate. He is a man of action and deeds and has the happy faculty of being able to work with other men and get results.—Manistique Pioneer Tribune.

TRI-COUNTY REALTORS FINISH ORGANIZATION

Constitution and By-Laws Adopted and Officers Elected

All preliminaries to the organization of the Tri-County Real Estate board, were completed Tuesday night at a meeting held at Wolverine Hotel, Boyne City. This board is composed of real estate brokers from Antrim, Charlevoix and Emmet counties who have banded together to promote standardized real estate practice, a code of ethics, co-operation among themselves, and protection for the public against dishonesty and irregularity. It will apply for membership in the Michigan Real Estate association and the National Association of Real Estate boards, which will give local members the privilege of using the title "realtor" and enjoying the benefits that go with that title.

Constitution and by-laws were adopted at this meeting; and the officers elected are T. B. McCuteheon of Bellaire, president; E. C. Mnthews of Harbor Springs, vice president; S. C. Smith of Petoskey, treasurer; and Charles Emrey of Charlevoix, secretary. In all, fourteen members were enrolled Tuesday members were enrolled last night, and others who were unable to be present have signified their intention of joining later.

This board has the distinction of drawing upon larger territory for its membership than other boards of the kind; but it is felt by the founders that with the interests of the three counties being so nearly similar, their co-operation will be highly profitable.

Held Beach Party

Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Webster entertained about fifteen of their local and out-of-town friends at a beach party held last Sunday evening on Pine Lake near the old beet sugar factory. The usual eats and rounds of jolly fun were enjoyed by all present, and the party was voted a huge success.

NOTES OF THE STATE FAIR

The 1926 Michigan State Fair will be the 77th in the history of the great state exposition.

The first Michigan State Fair was held in 1849. It has been held annually since, with the single exception of 1893.

Livestock premium lists for the 1926 Michigan State Fair rate with the leading three or four in the country, from the point of view to correct balance in allotments, according to Prof. G. A. Brown, of the Michigan State College.

ROAD BUILDING

PRESENT HIGHWAY PLAN IS FAVORED

According to a recent statement issued by the American Association of State Highway Officials, the need in road construction today is for a continuation of the national road-building plan now under way, and for national financial support of such a program until the federal aid system is completed.

The association recommends as the only fair basis for calculating the amount of money each state ought to contribute to the national building program a plan having the basic wealth of the nation as a basis rather than any plan based on national wealth.

The association says: "States that put flour in the bin and bacon on the shelf are entitled to equal consideration with other states that show on the surface larger cash payments to the federal government's road construction fund. The only fair method of determining an equitable diversion of funds is to base the apportionment on basic wealth rather than national wealth.

"When the federal government wants funds to meet its obligations, citizens are called upon irrespective of residence to pay according to their means. Probably the ideal way of considering the real business affairs of the nation as transacted under present-day methods would be to disregard all state lines and consider New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, San Francisco, etc., as clearing house centers in a nation-wide plan.

"But we have been in the habit of telling what this state does and what that state has accomplished so long that certain results are tabulated by states, when in reality some states would actually starve if it were not for their neighbors. Some of the richest states in the Union do not actually produce one-half of 1 per cent of the basic wealth so necessary to our very national existence."

The association ranks the first 15 states on the basis of basic wealth as follows: Pennsylvania, Texas, Illinois, California, Iowa, Oklahoma, Missouri, Minnesota, New York, Kansas, Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan and West Virginia. As a group, the association says, these states comprise less than one-third of the number of states, but 61.6 per cent of the national basic wealth. These states also represent 64.3 per cent of the national wealth and pay 72.24 per cent of the total internal revenue. The population of these states is 58.7 per cent of the population for the entire country.

Kansas and Iowa of this group are excellent examples of the type of state possessing great basic wealth, but much less apparent national wealth, says the report. Iowa with 2.2 per cent of the total population pays only .06 per cent of the total internal revenue returned, but produces 3.3 per cent of the national wealth and gives the nation 4.8 per cent of its basic wealth.

Kansas gives the nation 3 per cent of its basic wealth every year and is credited with 2 per cent of the national wealth, but is listed as paying only .07 per cent of the total internal revenue.

This is due, the association says, to the fact that these states give much of their basic wealth to other states who pay internal revenue upon it when it should be credited to the state of origin.

Hard-Surfaced Highways Gradually Deteriorate

There is no such thing as a permanent highway, observes the Fort Worth Star-Telegraph. The Department of Agriculture in Washington says that this error should no longer be harbored. It is now thoroughly understood that all roads gradually depreciate and wear out under wheels and weather. The job of maintaining a road is one of eternal vigilance.

Another common error, says the department, is that all roads should be hard-surfaced. When vehicles using a road are comparatively few, a road which is merely graded and drained can be maintained at a very low cost. It is not necessary to make a hard-surfaced road until the traffic becomes denser. No road should be improved beyond its earning capacity.

At the same time, improved roads are not luxuries. It costs more to repair motor vehicles than it does to fix roads. Logically, therefore, the only limit that should be placed on expenditure for road improvement is the amount that can be saved in vehicular operating costs. That depends, of course, upon the number of vehicles using the road. It is pointed out that the country loses more, in increased cost of operating vehicles, by not improving roads than it costs to improve them.

Canada Builds New Road

One of the most important and difficult links on a Canadian transcontinental highway, connecting Hope with Princeton, in the Canadian Rockies in British Columbia, is now being built by the Canadian government as a direct result of the pathfinding tour made last fall by Austin F. Bement, vice president of the Lincoln Highway association, and E. S. Evans, one of the founders of the association.

Use Old Newspapers

Newspapers make an excellent crack filler. Cut the papers fine and soak them. Make a paste by boiling one pound of flour in three quarts of water and add one teaspoonful of alum. Boil the shredded newspaper in this mixture until it becomes the consistency of putty. Force this into the cracks with a blunt knife. When it becomes dry stain or paint it to match the boards and you will have a smooth surface.

Old English Tradition

Who has heard of the "church in the wood" in the village of Hollington? Regarded as one of the quaintest churches in England, it is situated in the heart of a wood. There is a legend that the foundations were originally laid in the village, but the devil disagreed with the site and moved the stone to its present position.—London Tit-Bits.

World's Lightest Wood

Balsa is the lightest known wood. It is found in commercial quantities in Cuba, parts of Porto Rico, Jamaica, Trinidad and along the east coast of Central America, where it is confined very largely to the mangrove swamps and to other inaccessible swampy places. Exploiters often experience the greatest difficulty in getting the logs out of these swamps.

BONDING ISSUE FAILS TO CARRY

Defeated by Overwhelming Majority at Monday Election

The proposition to bond taxable property in school district No. 1, Charlevoix city and township, for the sum of $200,000 for the erection of a new high school, failed when put up to our citizens last Monday evening at a special election by a vote of 121 yes, and 176 no. Two blank ballots were cnst.

The meeting wns nttended by over three hundred pepple. Open discussion of the proposition took up considernble time before the polls were open.

The general opinion of those who voted seemed to center on the fact that the proposition had not been thoroughly explained in detail. Some seemed to carry the idea that we were more in nced of a central school, than of a building that would only house from the seventh grnde up.

Others carried the idea that the carrying of the bond issue would result in excessive taxation. Of course many were there who were opposed to a new building of any kind.

All, however, agree that something should be done to remedy the present situation. The matter will without doubt again be brought to a vote.

WORKERS HELP CAL CAMPBELL IN CAMPAIGN

Former Michigan Central Conductor Knows Workers' Side of Life and Has Always Been Actively Interested in Their Welfare.

Development in Northern Michigan in the next two years should be rapid, especially in the counties comprising the 29th Senatorial district, which contain hundreds of thousands of acres of Michigan's most beautiful resort land.

Realizing this and believing this district should send to the state senate, a man who is enthusiastically anxious about this development, Cal Campbell of Indian River, has been given strong endorsement all over the district.

He is now campaigning for the Republican nomination. He believes the great state of Michigan should act immediately to help develop this great north country. He believes the state should build new roads into the hundreds of thousands of acres of beautiful wild land along the Lake Huron and Lake Michigan shores. He believes this should be done without further delay. He believes also that this great state should appropriate money to advertise to the world, the beauties contained in the northern part.

Cal Campbell has lived in Northern Michigan 48 years, coming to Gaylord when only 12 years old, later he worked on the Michigan Central Railroad and step by step rose to the position of conductor. He held this job for 25 years and then opened up a stone quarry at Afton known as the Campbell Stone Co. This plant employs a large number of men. Practically all of them have worked for Mr. Campbell for years because he is a friend to them. He knows the workingman's side of life and has always done everything in his power to further their interests.

Even back in the days when he first started railroading, he took an active interest in his fellow man and worked out the first railroad men's organization on the Michigan Central. It was known then as the brotherhood of Railroad trainmen. In the capacity of chairman of the grievance committee Mr. Campbell drew up the first pay schedule ever submitted to the Michigan Central and still has the original copy. He still retains his membership in this Brotherhood.

So Cal Campbell knows the workers' side of life. He is interested in their welfare, as all his employes and their friends throughout Northern Michigan will testify. On top of this, he is true to Northern Michigan. He is a firm believer in this great resort country. He is anxious to see it develop and wants the state to do its part. He has no axes to grind. No normal school to fight for, no pet projects to father, but he DOES believe that the entire state should help develop Northern Michigan and should do it now.

Cal Campbell is one of Michigan's foremost business men and has the ability to help Northern Michigan in its development.

If the people of this great resort country want to help to develop their own town, village, community or city, and believe as Cal Campbell does, that the state should do its part, then a vote, for Cal Campbell for State Senator on Sept. 14, will be a vote in this direction.—Adv. 35tf

AT THE MOVIES

"The Song and Dance Man"

The real inside story of back-stage Broadway—its glamor and bright lights, its pathos and romance—is revealed in "The Song and Dance Man," Herbert Brenon's sympathetic picturization of George M. Cohan's famous stage success.

The picture has been staged with a lavish hand. Mr. Brennon went to great lengths in reproducing the atmosphere and environment of the theater. Settings are authentic down to the minutest detail, and several of New York's best-known theaters provide the realistic backgrounds around which the picture is built. At Palace Theater, September 4 and 5.

Sleuthing Methods Meet Movie Gaze in "Her Second Chance"

Modern methods of sleuthing will be shown on the screen next Wednesday and Thursday, when "Her Second Chance," with Anna Q. Nilsson in the leading feminine role, comes to the Palace Theatre, September 8 and 9.

Actor Improves Upon Lon Chaney

Arthur Rankin is one of the few screen actors who can sympathize with Lon Chaney's screen twistings. For this actor has just joined the ranks of the contortionists which Chaney hends. And, if anything, he is going him one better.

In "Old Loves and New," Marion Fairfax's production of E. M. Hull's celebrated novel, "The Desert Healer," which comes to the Palace Theatre September 10, Rankin impersonates a wounded war veteran. It is questionable whether Chaney, for all his distortions, has gone through a more severe ordeal.

Matt Moore Is Exceptional in "Early to Wed"

Five Charlevoix County Club Members to Attend State Fair at Detroit

As a result of the contests held at the Northern Michigan Boys and Girls' club camp at Gaylord, August 17-20 and which 18 club members attended, five boys were awarded a trip to Detroit with all traveling expenses paid by the State Fair.

Three of the boys will represent the calf club as a judging team, due to their efforts in giving Charlevoix county second place at Gaylord in competition with some twelve counties.

This is the big event that all members of Boys' and Girls' clubs look forward to and comes as a reward for excelling in club work and the following three boys will make the trip, having scored highest in the order named:

Arnold Smith, East Jordan; Alfred Larsen, East Jordan; Hubert Straw, Charlevoix; with Frank Severance, East Jordan; and Harvey McPherson, East Jordan, as alternates.

In the Handicraft club demonstrations the team consisting of Charles and Lewis Kleinhans of Clarion won first place and also win a trip to Detroit with their leader W. C. Palmer, through whose sincere and conscientious efforts the work has been carried on so successfully.

Let's all congratulate these five boys and hopefully anticipate that they will win state honors and be awarded a trip to the Chicago Livestock and Hay Congress in December.

The DAIRY

FEED CABBAGE AND POTATOES TO COWS

Potatoes may be fed to dairy cows immediately after milking without noticeably affecting either the flavor or odor of the milk or cream. Similarly, cabbage may be fed with but slight effect on the flavor and odor of these products. These facts were brought out in experiments conducted by experts of the United States Department of Agriculture to determine whether feeding cabbage or potatoes affects the flavor and odor of milk and to ascertain how they may be fed and the milk handled so as to minimize any objectionable effect on its quality.

The investigation was conducted with six Holstein and ten Jersey cows, representative of the two breeds, weighing on an average 1,145 and 918 pounds respectively. The stage of lactation varied from fresh cows to those nearing the end of their lactation period.

The animals were divided into groups of four. One group received a ration consisting of two parts (by weight) each of hominy feed, bran, and oats, and of one part each of cottonseed meal and linseed meal. In addition, the cows were fed all the alfalfa hay they would consume readily. Besides the hay and grain ration, the other three groups received, respectively, the following quantities of cabbage: 15 pounds one hour before milking, 30 pounds one hour before milking, and 30 pounds immediately after milking. This practice was followed for four consecutive days, but on the fifth day no cabbage was fed. The cows in the various groups were then interchanged in order to equalize any abnormal results in the milk of an individual animal. There were times, however, when certain cows failed to consume the entire amount of cabbage fed. Of each 15-pound portion of cabbage fed an average of 14.3 pounds was eaten; while when 30 pounds was fed an average of 24 pounds was consumed. Samples were taken from the milk of each cow at the time of milking and cooled but not aerated. The samples were examined for flavor and odor by experienced judges having no knowledge as to which cow produced a particular sample.

It was found that when dairy cows consume an average of 14.3 pounds of cabbage one hour before milking the flavor and odor of their milk are unfavorably affected. An increase in the amount of cabbage fed intensifies the objectionable flavor and odor. In the case of cows eating 15 pounds of cabbage immediately after milking there are but few resulting objectionable odors and flavors in the milk. In connection with these experiments another series of tests was made under similar conditions to determine the effect of feeding potatoes on the flavor and odor of milk.

These tests showed that when dairy cows consume an average of 14.8 pounds of potatoes one hour before milking, slightly abnormal flavors and odors may be produced, but they are so slight that they would seldom be noticed by the average consumer. Increasing the amount of potatoes fed one hour before milking from 14.8 pounds to 29.3 pounds does not increase objectionable flavors and odors in the milk. Dairy cows may safely be fed 28.7 pounds of potatoes immediately after milking without affecting the odor and flavor of the milk.

Proper aeration is of value in reducing strong abnormal flavors and odors in milk caused by feeding cabbage, and some of the slightly objectionable flavors and odors may be entirely eliminated by this method.

From Four to Six Weeks Vacation Is Long Enough

Cows should not go dry too long at a time, four to six weeks vacation from milk production is long enough. When cows remain dry through a long period of time the blood has a tendency to get too rich and trouble may follow. Too long a dry period in a cow's life is not to make her forget that her function and life's work should be the production of milk.

It may seem strange but it is true that some cow owners breed their cows to freshen in the spring, then when fall months and winter approach they dry up the cows with the explanation that the bovines won't give enough milk in winter to pay "fussing" with them.

Coming back to feeding through the dry period it may be well to emphasize liberal feeding. While on good pasture the average-sized cow should have at least eight pounds of oats and four pounds of bran each day. The oats part of this ration is essential and should be divided equally for each feeding time.

BEST TREATMENT FOR MILK FEVER

The average dairyman is not greatly troubled with milk fever in his herd for this disease affects only high-producing cows. Those who own high producers, however, should watch them closely during the first 48 hour period after calving, as that is the time the disease appears, if at all.

The symptoms of milk fever are restlessness of the cow, stooping of the feet and general nervousness. Then follows paralysis in the hind legs and staggering. In severe attacks the cows usually lie down with their heads thrown back and the muzzles pointing toward the flanks. Unless relief is given, milk fever cases often result in death within 24 or 36 hours.

Every dairyman who has heavy milkers should be provided with a "milk fever outfit," consisting of an air pump and a test tube, put together in such a way as to make it possible to inflate the udder with pure, sterilized air. Any druggist who does not carry these outfits in stock can secure one on short order. However, there is little use in sending for the outfit after a cow is down with the fever, as she is apt to be dead before it can be delivered. Buy an outfit now if you have reason to believe that one or more of your cows may become affected with milk fever this year. Pumping the udder of a cow affected with milk fever full of air and leaving the air in the udder for 12 to 24 hours is practically a sure cure. At any rate there is no better treatment for this disease. If you are caught without a milk fever outfit, get in touch with your local veterinarian at once, as he undoubtedly is prepared to give immediate relief.

To Avoid Feed Flavors Caused by Many Weeds

In the fall of the year when the pastures get low, creameries commonly have trouble from what is known as feed flavors caused from the cows eating various kinds of weeds, writes A. J. McGuir in The Farmer. Undesirable flavors are also caused from rye and rape pasture, and from various kinds of vegetables, especially onions and cabbage leaves.

It is an established fact that feed consumed by cows exerts the strongest effect when the feed has been consumed a few hours before milking. For this reason, feeds that are apt to produce an undesirable flavor should always be fed immediately after milking. In the case of rye and rape pasture, the cows should be turned on such pasture for only a few hours in the morning after milking. The same would apply to weedy pastures.

Where the cows have to be fed supplementary feeds, such as bundle corn, these feeds should be fed in the afternoon, and the cows kept off the pasture that is apt to produce undesirable flavors. Silage should always be fed immediately after milking, rather than before.

Raising Dairy Calf

In raising the dairy calf, leave the calf with the cow for one or two days and then take it away and feed from eight to ten pounds of warm milk per day for about two weeks. Then start substituting a little skim milk, increasing gradually until at six weeks of age, the calf will be on skim milk entirely. From twelve to sixteen pounds make a good daily feed. Be sure to keep the pails clean and feed regularly.

Dairy Hints

Silage is the only thing that will take the place of summer grass for the dairy cow.

Low-producing cows should be culled out now. It will not pay to keep them through the winter.

Feed left in the trough spoils the cow's appetite for the next meal and therefore is worse than wasted.

Give the milk cow a rest period before time for her to freshen again, advise dairy extension workers.

Milkers or milk handlers having any infectious disease should not milk cows or have anything to do with the milk, as they may infect it and cause disease among consumers.

The use of a silo will cheapen the cost of milk production. According to records from cow-testing associations, the average monthly feed cost was $2.50 more per cow when silage was not included in the ration.

Corn fodder is about equal to hay from the grasses, and is a wasteful feed for dairy cows. It should be ensiled, retaining all its feeding value, plus succulence.

• • •

This is the time of year when good shelter for dairy cows means more milk in the pail. A comfortable, contented cow will produce much better than one forced to find shelter on the north side of a barbed wire fence. Don't forget to fire up the tank heater, either. If you want to get results from your cows.

Watch Elimination!

Good Health Depends Upon Good Elimination.

RETENTION of bodily waste in the blood is called a "toxic condition." This often gives rise to a dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. Thousands have learned to assist their kidneys by drinking plenty of pure water and the occasional use of a stimulant diuretic. 50,000 users give Doan's signed endorsement. Ask your neighbor!

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH
B. G. Mattson, D. D., Pastor

Services at the Congregational church for Sunday, September 5th, will continue on the summer schedule with Sunday school at 9:30 and morning worship and sermon at 10:30. Dr. Mattson will preach, subject, "Religion's Near Neighbors: Labor, Wealth and Citizenship."

The evening service at 7:30 will be devoted to a further study of favorite hymns followed by an informal discussion of the topic, "The Mystery and Power of Religious Music."

The service at the Ironton church is at 2:30 with Sunday school session followed by a brief sermon.

The sermon last Sunday morning by Dr. Selbie Vance at the Congregational church was a powerful message which gripped the hearts of the large congregation. It was a remarkably original presentation of the Gospel of John. The congregation was taken by the preacher far from Charlevoix and found themselves sitting in a church in the ancient city of Ephesus while the people listened not to Dr. Vance, but to the aged pastor of the Ephesus church as he told how he came to write different parts of the gospel as memoirs of his life and summaries of his 25 years as pastor of the Ephesus church. The core of it all was his intense loyalty to his Master, Jesus. The story was told with the closest fidelity to the historical setting but with a dramatic power and directness of appeal which deply moved all who heard it. Dr. Vance is a great preacher as well as a scholarly and gifted teacher, occupying a chair in the Western Theological Seminary at Pittsburgh, Pa.

In closing the notable series of August Sunday morning sermons, Dr. Mattson expressed feelingly his own and the people's appreciation and gratitude for the services of the preachers, Dr. David Jones, Rev. Carl Glover, Dr. Wm. Lampe, Dr. H. H. Forsythe and Dr. Vance.

At the evening service last Sunday, Rev. C. E. Tuggart, former pastor of this church for seven years preached again to his old congregation and was heard with much appreciation. Dr. David Jones conducted an inspiring song service in the devotional part of the service.

COMMUNICATIONS

To the Women of Charlevoix County:

Because Michigan is so largely Republican, the candidates for state offices who win out at the September primaries are practically sure to be elected in November. This is also true of county candidates in this county, so the primary election is very important here.

The best way to show approval of the Prohibition Amendment and its enforcement is to vote for dry candidates at the primaries. We can hardly expect those who are not in sympathy with the laws to enforce them wholeheartedly.

One of the oddities of American political life is the fact that millions of voters do not vote. Many organizations in order to change this condition are working for a 100 per cent vote and are making it their business to interest the voters and get them to the polls.

What most women want is a 100 per cent Dry Vote and to insure this we urge them in every locality to organize a house to house canvass and to talk everywhere the danger of a wet majority unless every dry vote is cast. Saturday, September 4th, is the last day to register. The Primary Election is Tuesday, September 14th. Every patriotic citizen will vote!

(Signed) Mrs. Josephine Vanllorn and Mrs. T. J. Smith of Boyne City; Mrs. E. E. Cross and Mrs. B. Saltonstall, Charlevoix; Mrs. R. G. Gleason and Mrs. Ethel Clark, East Jordan.—County Committee of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

EMMET COUNTY ANNUAL FAIR

AT PETOSKEY GROUNDS SEPTEMBER 7 to 14

Open Day and Night With Unusual Attractions—Free Auction Friday Afternoon

All indications point to the annual Emmet County Fair, to be held on Charlevoix avenue, Petoskey, September 7, 8, 9 and 10, being the most unusual and interesting event of its kind ever held in the county. More and larger exhibits, a speed program with purses aggregating $1,500, three days of baseball for the county championship, a boxing girl who will meet all comers, free attractions and a free auction sale will be among the events.

The fair will be open day and night and the races will be on September 8, 9 and 10. Trotting, pacing, running and shetland pony races will constitute the program.

The girl boxer will meet one opponent every day and one each evening. She will meet Eddie Bisque Thursday afternoon and Stanley Bisque that same evening. Other well known northern Michigan boxers will don the gloves with her in the squared circle.

The free attractions are said to be the finest ever offered at a northern fair. All are under the management of one company, thus insuring against duplication. All acts are clever and worth while, and they will be shown every afternoon and evening.

There will be no extra admission charge for the ball games. Wednesday at 3 p. m. Pellston will play the Michigan Tanning and Extract company; on the next day the winner of the Wednesday contest will be pitted against the Petoskey Independents and on Friday Harbor Springs will go against Thursday's winner.

The free auction sale on Friday afternoon will feature the sale of farm stock, machines, household goods and other articles. The only cost will be the fee to the auctioneer, and visitors are invited to bring things for the sale.

LOCAL COUPLE HAVE ROMANTIC WEDDING

Married In Indian Mission at Middle Village

The following article relating to the marriage of Ralph Hamilton, son of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Hamilton of this city, to Miss Margaret Churney of Cincinnati, was taken from the Grand Rapids Press:

"From Charlevoix comes the story of a very charming wedding with an enchanting setting that is truly romantic.

Three years ago Miss Margaret Churney of Cincinnati became acquainted with Ralph Hamilton of Charlevoix. During the friendship that followed they visited at various times the quaint little Indian church at Middle Village and Miss Churney vowed to herself that if she ever married she would be married in that church.

Recently Miss Churney and Mr. Hamilton decided to marry, and one morning the bridal party drove from Charlevoix to Middle Village where Rev. F. R. Arnold sang high mass, with an Indian choir, Indian altar boys and a full-blood Indian witness. After the ceremony the party, accompanied by Mr. Arnold, went to Old Trail Inn for the wedding breakfast.

The matron of honor was Mrs. Burton Cress of Cincinnati, O., and the bridesmaid was Miss Mayne Hartman of Cincinnati. Julius Kosequnt, n full-blood Indian, friend of the bridegroom, acted as best man. Other guests were Miss Elizabeth Schmidt of Cincinnati and Miss Katherine Bockwhite of Indianapolis.

The bride was lovely in her white wedding gown and with her attendants dressed in pastel shades, the silent witnesses and the charm and beauty of the quaint surroundings, all seemed to blend together to accentuate the beauty and romance of the scene which was further heightened by the solemn rites of the wedding service.

Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton will remain at Charlevoix and surrounding resorts for a short while and later will be at home to their friends in Grand Rapids, where Mr. Hamilton is employed with the Standard Oil Co."

A Letter on Truth and Fidelity to Our County

Charlevoix, Mich., Aug. 30, 1926.

The man who starts the day with a firm determination that "nothing but truth shall escape his lips this day," and who adheres strictly to his text, has nothing to fear from any combination of liars, no matter how strong it may be. Truth is present at all times and in all places, and is always true. If people would only take time to learn and to understand the truth about things in which they are interested, instead of simply believing, they would be a great deal better off. It must be apparent to all of us that we can progress only in the degree that we overcome the barrier between reason and truth on on side and instinct, doubt and fear on the other side.

It is a fact that today Charlevoix county needs the assistance of every law abiding citizen in order that we may take advantage of every opportunity to advance our interests, and it is time also, that we should know that he that is not with us in our work for good, is against us. All we have to do to prove this, is to look back on the great mistake we made a dozen or fifteen years ago when we had raised the money to bond for the sum of $100,000.00 with which to build the twenty miles of concrete road on the Dixie Highway. We simply let it slip, by not being on the job. No one man was to blame, but on the contrary, every man was to blame for we should have had the the entire twenty miles built for less than the $100,000.00 if we had been on the job. I want to make this plain, so that if we get the opportunity to build the road around Pine Lake or Lake Charlevoix as it probably will be called, we won't sit idly by, and say, oh the boys will build it. John, Jim and George, all of them are working for it, and they'll see that it is built. Well, it's just such d——n fool talk as this, that prevents many a good work from ever being commenced. This good concrete road around Pine Lake is an opportunity of a lifetime and should not be allowed to fail, and if it does fail you indifferent fellers will get the blame. Many of our people comfort themselves and try to comfort me because we did get (after a strenuous fight) 12½ miles. Well, I'll tell you, it does not comfort me for we only got 62½ per cent of what we should have had. No man every made a success in business who followed it up on that basis.

The true way to do is to acknowledge the mistake, rectify and straighten it out. Buck up and not let the same thing happen again.

Yours truly,
Uncle George.

HOOKER'S RIDING ACADEMY AT FAIR

Horseback Riding and Other New Stunts Featured

M. B. Hooker of "Hooker's Riding Academy" will be at the Charlevoix County Fair, September 14, 15, 16, and will give the people an unusual and exciting outlay of stunts on horseback.

Mr. Hooker is one of the oldest horsemen (we are proud to say the youngest for his age) that our county has, and if you do not believe this, try him out on any horseback riding stunts you wish.

Come to the Fair and witness another potato race like the one which created so much excitement last year. You will also see the tandem drive, egg race, overall race, and many other new stunts on horseback, all of which show skill and horsemanship of high character of Mr. Hooker and his riders.

Remember the dates, and watch for the big page ad. in our next issue. Then come! to the biggest and best Fair in the history of our Fair.

Political Announcement

To the Voters of Charlevoix County:

I have decided to become a candidate for re-election to the office of Road Commissioner, on the Republican ticket, at the primaries September 14, 1926. If my work during the time I have served you in this capacity has been satisfactory, and it is your wish that I be re-elected, your support will be greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,

High school (by year) $60. Tuition is payable in advance and provision for puyment must be made during the first two weeks of school.

State W. C. T. U. Speaker

Miss Margaret Bilz, a state W. C. T. U. worker, will speak on "The Second Mile" at 7:30 p. m. next Wednesday, at the Baptist church. A musical program in charge of Mrs. A. J. Stelter will precede the lecture. Everyone interested in temperance work is invited.

WHY PERPETUATE THESE MEN IN PUBLIC OFFICE

A vote for Alex Groesbeck Sept. 14 is a vote for the perpetuation in offico of the following job bolders:

Ike Bloom.
George Welsh.
"Zilwaukea" Baird.
Henry Croll.
Elton R. Eaton.
Rev. Edgar Cochrun.

Would you give a single ona of them an executive place in your business? Will any clear-thinking voter in Michigan exercise his American privilege at the polls to put his atamp of approval on public servants of such caliber?

A vote for Green is a spike in the casket in which will be interred a detestable brand of political slime and the bones of rank incompetency.

NO CONTEST FOR THESE OFFICES

FORMER HOSPITAL OFFICIALS TO CARRY ON WORK

Audit of Treasurer's Books Show Local Institution in Fine Financial Condition

There is one election held each year in Charlevoix in which there is no scrumble for offices—the annual election of trustees for the Charlevoix Hospital.

The annual election took place Wednesday evening, September 1, with just a quorum present. The scramble (?) for offices resulted in the re-election of P. D. Campbell, C. N. Bridge and A. J. Usher as trustees for three yenrs to succeed themselves. The trustees, in choosing their offlcers, re-elected M. A. Levinson, president; Geo. Glados, vice president, C. N. Bridge, secretury, and A. J. Usher, treusurer. The affair in smoothness of action, had nll the ear-marks of a Republican county convention.

The Charlevoix Hospital, an institution every citizen should point to with pride, is in a healthy financial condition. Not one cent of indebtedness on an investment that will run over $40,000.00. This condition is due to liberal yearly donations froni both summer nnd all year round residents. The hospital is not self-mnintaining—it never will be—but the deficit is made up by people who realize the necessity of an institution of this kind in Charlevoix.

The audit of the treasurer's books, made by Oluf Nordrum, follows:

CHARLEVOIX---A HAVEN OF REST

NO PEN CAN DESCRIBE ITS BEAUTY SAYS CHICAGOIAN

See and Admire with Understanding Many Have for Grandeur in Naturo and Mankind

A vivid description of Charlevoix, as seen by a dweller of the city, has been presented us for publication. Helen Meister is the writer. She mentions our beautiful lakes, harbor, dwellings, the great relief experienced by one accustomed to city life. Charlevoix appeals to all in the same manner. Hundreds have left here with the same impression—all delighted and with plans in view to come again. Is it any wonder Charlevoix has a world-wide reputation as the summer play-ground of the north. Miss Meister's letter follows:

"We went to Charlevoix on the palatinl Str. Manitou, operated hy the Michigan Transit Co. out of Chicago. The sea was smooth, the weather beautiful. Towards morning we passed a small chunnel on whose borders a little town was situated; there were a few graceful buildings, but the greater part looked like shattered, clumsy barns built in a hurry for business-snke. Our little steamer went onward, the sun was shining, the air was fresh and cool and our boat glided like a swan over the undulnting waves.

"Approaching our aim—"Charlevoix-the-Beautiful"—the passengers left the cabins, halls nnd passages and streamed out to the deck to view the landing. Charlevoix! Charlevoix! came the outery of the people, anxious to be on dry ground.

"I have seen beautiful countries, panornmas like Constantinople that you can never forget. Charlevoix does not belong to the wonders of the world. After residing for years in Chicago, inhaling the smoke of the factories, the odor of the alleys and saturating your eyes on the monotony of dirty streets with papers flying around the corners, you feel yourself relieved breathing the clean, pure nir thnt is prevailing in the state of Michigan, especially at Charlevoix.

"Charlevoix is situated on three lakes—Michigan, Round and Lake Charlevoix (Pine Lake). A narrow channel 40 feet wide, unites Michigan Lake to Lake Charlevoix, over which a bridge is spnnned. Round Lake is winding itself in a small-like form and unites with Lake Charlevoix by a small passage.

"The borders of the three water basins are covered with various trees, as pines, firs and many other species with flowers in various colors and sizes, but the beauty of Charlevoix consists in its valleys, hills and terraces surrounding the lakes in irregular lines. Looking at them you enjoy the grandeur of nature, being the upheavals of volcanic origin, they appear as though carved by art of men.

"No pen can describe its beauty and completeness in form. You have to sea and admire them with that understanding that many people have for grandeur in nature and mankind.

"The hills, terraces and valleys are atudded with evergreen needle trees and other beautiful foliage. The houses scattered all over are blistering through the foliage like little diamonds or rubies, differing in size and color. They represent various styles taken from all uges and all countries and built according to the taste of its owner.

"I forget the sidewalks—the peculiar American sidewalks—the first step to civilization, the forerunner of the new town, the new establishment—and so in Charlevoix we probably had the trattoir before the place was built up. They stretch in all directions, environing houses, gardens, parks and play grounds. You can never miss them—you will find them all over—on the terraces, and in the valleys, white like snow on a winter day in Chicago.

"Besides, we have singing birds; they salute you with their melodious voices early in the morning. You rub your eyes and glance at the sky—what wonderful colors, beginning from pink till dark blue—what view, what panorama! Are you on earth or in paradise?

"That is Charlevoix as it appears to me, to my inner eye, to the visitor who came here to seek relief, strength and consolation."

ATTEMPTED TO ESCAPE FROM SHERIFF CARPENTER

Had Been Previously Given From Two to Fourteen Years for Pasing Bad Cbecks

Fred Brown, known also under several aliases, was shot by Sheriff George Carpenter of Emmet county, when he tried to make his escape while heing returned to the Emmet county jail last Wednesday.

Brown had just been sentenced to from two to fourteen years imprisonment by Judge Frank Shepard at Petoskey, nnd had crossed Enst Lake street with the sheriff beside him. Just as they reached the sidewalk beside the jail, Brown broke loose and ran. He ran swiftly nnd guined a lead of almost 200 feet while the sheriff was commanding him to halt. He did not stop and Carpenter opened fire with his revolver, firing low for fear of hitting pedestrians. Three shots failed to halt the fugitive, although wounded, and he was finally trapped by the sheriff and his son behind the Cushman hotel.

Brown is regarded as a "bad man." About two weeks ago he tried to dig his way out through the jail wall, and the Petoskey crimes he is accused of are the passing of a bogus $50 check at the First State bank of Petoskey and one for $62.50 at the Temple Shop on Lake street. Both were signed with the name of a Charlevoix man who has an account in a bank in this city, and the arrest was made by Sheriff Charles Novak, of Charlevoix county, on information from Gloucester, Mass., that he was wanted there for passing spurious checks, stealing an automobile and jumping a bail bond.

MISS BEUKE HOSTESS AT BIRTHDAY PARTY

Entertained in Honor of Her Friend, Mrs. Artbur Ranger

Miss Francis Beuke of St. Louis, Mo., entertained sixteen of her Charlevoix and St. Louis friends last Sunday evening at a party in honor of Mrs. Arthrur Ranger's birthday anniversary.

The party gathered early in the evening at the Ranger home and went from there to Mont's restaurant, where a delightful luncheon and dancing were enjoyed. Later returning to the Ranger home, music, songs and dancing took up the remainder of the evening.

Mrs. Ranger received many fine presents from her friends to remind her of the occasion and Miss Beuke received due praise for her ability as a hostess.

PACEMAKERS HERE FOR CONVENTION

ARE SALESMEN OF KALAMAZOO LOOSE LEAF BINDER CO.

Visitors High in Their Praises of City and Claim We Have Everything a Convention Needs

The Inn hotel is now entertaining its second convention of the year. About fifty members of the sales organization nlong with executives of the Kalamazoo Loose Leaf Binder Company, of Kalamazoo, Mich., arrived at The Inn, Tuesday, and will enjoy a week's outing, the convention closing on Saturday, the 11th.

These men come from all parts of the country and they are salesmen who succeeded in making their quota in a sales contest held during the four summer months of the year. One of their number made this statement: "We are here for a week of fun. During the past four months we have forgotten all pleusure and have devoted our entire time to the sales contest just closed. Now wo intend to play as hard as we have worked."

The visitors are high in their praises of our wonderful city and claim we have every facility for handling conventions. Hotel accommodations are unexcelled, with tennis, golf, fishing, boating, etc., at their doorsteps. They said they could not figure out why down state cities are picked for meetings of this kind, when the success of most conventions depends entirely upon facilities present for the entertainment of visiting delegates. We have everything—and what's more, they tell us so!

Everything possible is being done by the Association of Commerce to add to the pleusure of the visiting convention. On Thursday morning, between 9 und 12 o'clock, the salesmen were taken on an nuto sight-seeing trip, visiting points of interest in and near the city.

Those present at the convention are the following:

J. D. Creel, Tampn, Fla.; J. W. Hamilton, Kalamazoo, Mich.; B. T. Rowley, Newark, N. J.; W. M. Stockdell, Miami, Fla.; J. J. Georgens, Newark, N. J.; J. F. Sanderson, Dallas, Tex.; E. E. LYDIA of the Pines

by HONORÉ WILLSIE

COPYRIGHT by FREDERICK A. STOKES CO.
WNU SERVICE

From her long service as editor of the Delineator, a magazine for women it was assumed that Mrs Willsie would know what women liked to read, but it was not until she began writing novels, largely of western American life, that it was discovered that she both knew, and could write, stories that had a strong appeal to men. There are two reasons for her success in striking masculine preference. The first is in the fact that the men she puts in her books—the heroes—are never too heroically brave or good to be possible—just regular men. The second is that the heroines she depicts are mostly the sort of girls that regular men are very keen about. She thus enjoys the distinction of having a wide and loyal circle of readers among the members of both sexes.

Her story, "Lydia of the Pines," is largely a depiction of a very charming young woman, sweet and appealing in every way, who was plagued with that troublesome thing, a New England conscience. It will be recalled that the conscience did not prevent our ancestors from despoiling the Indians of their lands and otherwise giving the red men rather a raw deal; and that very inconsistency between creed and actions has a strong bearing on this story. New Englanders and Indians figure in it again, the former as settlers and residents of a modern community in one of the north Mississippi states and the latter as a pitifully starved, diseased and half-degenerated race struggling to hang onto certain reservation lands which the white man also wants.

Lydia's conscience was even tougher than that justly celebrated one of her forbears, for in spite of the land hunger she had inherited, she could not make the compromise with principle which her best friends and even her own father were willing to make. In this slip of a girl with the average characteristics of her sex—love of dresses, finery, culture and worldly comfort, and a natural desire for masculine admiration—there was still something of the stuff that makes martyrs. It is a fine picture of the best in Puritan traits, which still persists in some beings in spite of modern influences and dilution of blood. The way in which Lydia settled her problem makes a fine story. Her unyielding character and its influence upon all the characters with which it came in contact is a refreshing study. And it is all told without any excess of sentimentality, any preaching or any exaggeration. Both saint and sinner loved Lydia and so will you whether you are one or the other or a mixture of both.

CHAPTER I

The Toy Balloon

There is a state in the north Mississippi valley unexcelled for its quiet beauty. To the casual traveler there may be a certain monotony in the unending miles of rolling green hills, stretching on and on into distant, pale skies. But the native of the state knows that the monotony is only seeming.

He knows that the green hills shelter in their gentle valleys many placid lakes. Some of them shallow and bordered with wild rice. Some are couched deep in the hollow of curving bluffs. Some are carefully secreted in virgin pine woods. From the train these pines are little suspected. Fire and the ax have long since destroyed any trace of their growth along the railway.

In summer the whole great state is a wonderland of color. Wide wheat lands of a delicate yellowish green sweep mile on mile till brought to pause by the black green of the woods.

An old state, as we measure things out of New England, settled by New Englanders during the first great emigration after the War of 1812. Its capital, Lake City, lays claim to almost a century of existence. Lying among the hills in the northern part of the state, it contains both the state capitol and the state university. Of its thirty thousand inhabitants, five thousand are students and another five thousand are state legislators and state employees.

A quiet town, Lake City, with an atmosphere that might well belong to New England—beauty, culture, leisure, are its hallmarks.

Fifteen years ago half a mile inland from the lake was an empty block that once had been a farm pasture. Three fine old oaks stood with tops together in the center of the block. The grass was still firm and green and thick in the ancient pasture except for narrow trails worn by children's feet. To the initiated each trail told its own story. There was a hollow square that formed the baseball diamond. There was a straight, short cut that led to the little cress-grown spring. There were the parallel lines for "Come-Come Pull Away," and there were numerous bald spots, the center of little radiating trails where, in the fall, each group of children had its complicated roasting oven in which potatoes and "weenies" were cooked.

On one August afternoon the pasture seemed deserted. It was circus day and the children of the surrounding blocks had all by one method or another won admission to the big tent on the hill east of the town.

Yet not quite all the children. For under one of the oak trees was a baby carriage in which a little girl of two lay fast asleep. And far above her, perched lightly but firmly in a sweeping fork of the oak, was a long-legged girl of twelve. She set where she could peer easily down on her small sleeping sister, yet high enough to be completely hidden from casual view. She was a thin youngster, with short curling hair of a dusty yellow. The curly hair did not hide the fine square head, a noble head for so small a girl, set well on the little square shoulders. Her eyes were blue and black lashed, her nose nondescript, her mouth large, her chin square and her little jaw line long and pronounced. She wore a soiled sailor suit of blue galatea. Caught in the crotch of two opposite branches was a doll almost as large as the sleeping child below. It was a queer, old-fashioned doll, with a huge china head that displayed brilliant black hair and eyes as blue as those of her little mistress. The doll wore a clumsily made sailor suit of blue calico, which evidently had been washed recently, but not ironed. It is necessary to meet the doll properly, for she was an intimate and important member of the little girl's family. Her name was Florence Dombey.

A battered red book lay in Florence Dombey's lap. It was called, "With Clive in India." It was written by G. A. Henty and told of the marvelous and hairbreadth adventures of an English lad in an Indian campaign.

Florence Dombey's attention, however, was not on the book. It was riveted, hectically, on her mistress, who, with her tongue caught between her lips, was deftly whittling a cigar-box cover into doll furniture, of a scale so tiny that even had Florence Dombey had a doll of her own, it could not have hoped to use the furniture.

The little furniture maker suddenly closed the knife sharply. "Darn it! I've cut myself again," she said. She dropped the knife down the neck of her blouse and began to suck her finger. "There let me have Henty Florence Dombey. Don't try to play it all the time. You know I don't get hardly any time to read."

The furniture and the remains of the cigar-box cover followed the knife into her blouse and she opened the book. But before she had begun to read there was a sleepy little call from below.

"Yes, baby!" called the child. "Here's Lydia, up in the tree! Watch me, dearie! See me come down Here comes Florence Dombey first."

"Florence, Home Wiv Baby."

With some difficulty the book followed the knife and the furniture into the blouse. Florence Dombey, being hastily inverted, showed a length of light marlin cord wrapped about her cotton legs.

"Here she comes, baby! Catch now for Lydia."

The baby below, a tiny plump replica of Lydia, sat up with a gurgle of delight and held up her arms as Florence Dombey, dangling unhappily, upside down, on the end of the marlin cord, was lowered carefully into the perambulator.

"And here I come. Watch me baby!"

With a swing light and agile as a young monkey, Lydia let herself down landing with a spring of which an acrobat might have boasted, beside the perambulator.

"There, sweetness!"—kissing the baby—"first we'll fix Florence Dombey, then we'll start for home."

"Florence, home wiv baby."

"Yes, it's getting near supper time." Lydia tucked the still hectically staring doll in beside her small sister, turned the perambulator around and ran it along one of the little paths to the sidewalk.

At the crossing she met a small girl of her own age, who carried a toy balloon, and a popcorn ball.

"Hello, Lydia!" she cried. "It was a perfectly lovely circus!"

"Was it?" cried Lydia, with an indifferent voice that something in her blue eyes denied. "Well, I had to take care of little Patience!"

"Huh!" shrilled the little girl, "old Lizzie would have done that. I think your father's mean not to give you the money.

Lydia's red cheeks went still redder. "My father's got plenty of money," she began fiercely. Here the baby interrupted.

"Baby love pritty—Baby love—" she held out two beseeching dimpled hands toward the red balloon.

"Patience, you can't have it," cried Lydia. "It—it'll make your tummy ache. I'll buy you one when you're older."

The black-eyed child, holding the red balloon, suddenly kissed little Patience, who was the pet of all the children in the neighborhood, and put the string of her balloon into the dimpled hand. "I had the circus—you can have the balloon," she said.

Lydia jerked the string away and held it out to the owner.

"We're no cheerity charities, Margery," she said. "I'll get Patience a balloon."

"You're an awful liar and a cruel beast, Lydia!" cried Margery. She snatched the string and tied it about the baby's wrist. "You know you can't buy her one and you know she'll cry herself sick for one, now she's seen mine, and I guess I love her as much as you do."

Lydia looked from the cherub in the perambulator, crowing ecstatically over the red bubble that tugged at her wrist, to the defiant Margery.

"I'll let her have it, Margery," she said reluctantly. "I'll make you a doll's high chair."

"All right," said Margery, nonchalantly. "Face tag! So long!"

Lydia ran the perambulator along the board walk. The street was macadamized and bordered with thrifty maple trees. Back of the maple trees were frame houses, of cheap and stupid construction. Before one of these Lydia paused. It was a dingy brown house, of the type known as "story and a half."

Lydia opened the gate in the picket fence and tugged the perambulator through and up to the porch.

"There, baby mine, shall Lydia take you in for your supper?"

"Supper," cooed little Patience, lifting her arms.

Lydia lifted her to the porch with surprising ease. The little two-year-old should have been no light weight for the little mother of twelve. She stood on the porch watching Lydia arrange Florence Dombey in her place in the perambulator. The red balloon tugging at her wrist, her soiled little white dress blowing in the summer breeze, she finally grew impatient of Lydia's attentions to Florence Dombey.

"Baby eat now," she cried with a stamp of her small foot.

Lydia laughed. She ran up the steps, took the baby's hand and led her through the entry into a square little room, evidently the parlor of the home. It was dusty and disorderly.

Lydia disgorged the contents of her blouse upon the desk, then followed little Patience into the next room. This was larger than the first and was evidently the dining room and sitting room.

A short, stout old woman was setting the table. She had iron gray hair. Her face was a broad wreath of wrinkles, surrounding bespectacled black eyes and a thin mouth that never quite concealed a very white and handsome set of false teeth.

"See! Liz! See!" cried little Patience, pattering up to the old woman with the tugging balloon.

"Ain't that grand!" said Lizzie. "Where'd you git the money, Lydia? Baby's milk's in the tin cup on the kitchen table. Your father's home. You'd better fry the steak. He complains so about it when I do it."

Lydia left the baby clinging to Lizzie's skirts and went on into the kitchen. Her father was washing his hands at the sink.

"Hallo, dad!" she said. The child had a peculiar thread of richness in her voice when she spoke to little Patience, and it was apparent again as she greeted the man at the sink. He turned toward her.

"Well, young woman, it's about time you got home," he said. "Baby all right?"

Lydia nodded and turned toward the litter of dishes and paper parcels on the kitchen table. Amos Dudley at this time was about forty years

COMPETITION IN WORDS

One who goes into the market to buy a motor car today is naturally confused.

He has read the words best and greatest so often that they have ceased to be convincing. Where all is best, he reflects, there can be no best.

Thousand-dollar cars have been described to him in ten-thousand dollar language. And vice versa.

He finds himself the target in a war of adjectives; the helpless victim in a gigantic competition of words.

And so he is forced to rely on chance—the advice of friends—or his own limited experience.

Dodge Brothers, Inc., have never participated in this verbal competition.

They are content with the position they have long maintained in the far more vital competition of honest value.

They have continued steadily to improve their product, not only in comfort and beauty, but basically—beneath the body and hood where fundamental values lie.

Yet they have not unduly stressed each betterment that has marked the steady progress of their motor car toward a higher perfection.

And when economic conditions or greater sales have permitted them to reduce prices without reducing quality, they have announced the fact without excessive emphasis.

Unexaggerated truth is not spectacular. But in the long run, implicit public confidence has been Dodge Brothers reward, and this they propose to preserve forever by continuing to build just a little better than they tell.

CANDIDATE FRED W. GREEN

On May 19th, Mayor Fred W. Green of Ionia became a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of Michigan. Standing before a throng of Ionia county citizens, Mayor Green declared he was pledged to a campaign free from personalities and dedicated to the cause of better government in Michigan, and that there would never be an act of his that would call for an apology from the folks back home.

He has kept that promise. He has come down to the closing hours of the campaign pointing not to persons, but to the system of government now in existence at Lansing, declaring that if he is elected governor of Michigan he will render an accounting of his stewardship to the people of this state who are entitled to have first-hand knowledge of what is being done with the taxpayer's dollar.

In the present campaign hundreds of thousands of Michigan citizens have had an opportunity to see and hear Mayor Green, and have learned for themselves why Ionia county is a unit behind his candidacy. They have found that a man can be successful and human at the same time; that he stands dedicated to the cause of service at Lansing, and that he will never prostitute the high office of governor for the purpose of securing a third term or a fourth for himself.

Bitter personal attacks have been launched against Mayor Green in this campaign by men who were in a position to know their statements were false, but who in their desperation to save a falling dynasty have stooped at nothing to injury him in the eyes of Michigan voters. In reply to these harping critics he has turned the spotlight of truth upon his entire life to show how mean and contemptible are the methods being used to bring about his defeat. You can do no better service to yourself and the State of Michigan than by going to the polls next Tuesday, September 14th, and registering your choice for Fred W. Green and "Daylight Government."

What would the answer be if you were refused the ballot?—a musket on the shoulder and the tread of marching feet. Be a better citizen and vote Tuesday, September 14th.

HAPPY WEDDING WAS SOLEMNIZED TUESDAY

Mrs. Mary Mattison and John J. Wagner Married at Rose Home

A very pretty wedding was solemnized last Tuesday evening, September 7th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. S. M. Rose, when Mrs. Mary Mattison of Clearwater, Florida, was united in marriage to John J. Wagner of this city.

Rev. B. G. Mattson of the Congregational church performed the beautiful ring ceremony in the presence of about forty friends of the contracting parties, thus bringing to a happy conclusion a romance which dated back some 41 years. Mr. and Mrs. S. M. Rose acted as best man and bridesmaid and little Marelyn Smith was the ring bearer.

Mr. and Mrs. Wagner were royally entertained by the city band and a bunch of noisy youngsters after the ecremony, nnd repaid them with cigars and candy for their efforts.

Mr. and Mrs. Wagner expect to remain in Charlevoix until the first of October and will leave then on a tour which will eventually bring them to Clearwnter, Florida, where they will spend the winter. They have the very best wishes of their many friends.

County's Valuation Increased

We note by n publishcd report of the Stnte Board of Equalization, that Chnrlevoix county's valuation has been increased from $11,391,656 to $12,200,000, an incrense of $808,344. We cnnnot help but wonder how they hnve come to this conclusion. Antrim county, to our south, was decreased $440,230, and Emmet, to the north, $109,275. From their point of view, we must be living in an unusunlly prosperous community.

old—a thin man of medium weight, his brown hair already gray at the temples. Lydia evidently got from him the blue of her eyes and the white of her teeth. He began to peel off a pair of brown overalls.

"What's for supper?" he asked.

"Round steak," said Lydia.

"For heaven's sake, don't let Liz touch it."

"I won't," said the child, piling up dishes deftly.

"I'm going to give baby her cupful of milk, and then I'll fix it in my patent way."

Amos nodded. "You're a natural cook, like your mother." He paused, one leg of his overalls off, disclosing his shiny black trousers. Lydia carried the cupful of milk toward the dining room. From where he sat he could see her kneel before little Patience, and hold the cup, while the baby drank thirstily. Little motes of the sunset light danced on the two girls' golden heads. He looked from the children toward the dusty kitchen table.

"That h—l of a mess Liz does keep going," he muttered. "Patience would break her heart, if she knew. Oh! Patience, Patience!—"

Lydia came back with the empty cup. "Now for the steak," she exclaimed. "Gosh, what a fire—"

She attacked the greasy stove with enthusiasm and in a short time a savory smell of steak filled the house. Amos went into the dining room and sat in a rocking chair with little Patience and the balloon in his lap.

"Where'd she get the balloon?" asked Amos as Lydia brought in the platter of meat.

"Margery gave it to her," answered the child. "Supper's ready."

"Got it at the circus, I suppose. I wish I could 'a' let you go, Lydia, but at a dollar and a half a day, I swan I—"

"I didn't want to go," returned Lydia, setting the baby in her high chair. "I'm getting too big for circuses."

"Too big for a circus!" Her father looked at her with understanding eyes. "I guess heaven is paved with lies like yours, Lydia. John Levine will be over tonight. Get some of the mess dug out of the parlor, will you, Lizzie?"

"Sure," said Lizzie, good-naturedly. Lydia sat opposite her father and poured tea. The ancient maid of all work sat beside Patience and dispensed the currant sauce and the cake.

The baby was half asleep before the meal was ended. "She didn't finish her nap this afternoon," said Lydia. "I'll take her up to bed now and finish my cake afterward."

The little sisters slept together in a slant-ceilinged bedroom. Here again was dust and disorder, the floor covered with clothes and toys, the bed unmade, the old-fashioned mahogany bureau piled high with books, brushes, and soiled teacups that had held the baby's milk.

There was still light enough to see by. Lydia stood Patience on the bed and got her into her nightdress after gently persuading the baby to let her fasten the balloon to the foot of the bed. Then she carried her to the little rocker by the window and with a look that was the very essence of motherhood began to rock the two-year-old to sleep. Presently there floated down to Amos, smoking his pipe on the front step, Lydia's childish, throaty contralto:

I've reached the land of corn and wine
With all its riches surely mine;
I've reached that beauteous shining shore,
My heaven, my home, forevermore.

The coolness of the August wind touched Amos' face. "Oh! Patience, Patience—" he murmured.

Lydia sat for a moment or two with the sleeping baby in her arms, looking down on her with a curious gentle intentness. Then she rose carefully, and as carefully deposited little Patience on the bed. This done, she untied the balloon and carried it out with her to the little landing. There was a window here into which the August moon was beginning to shine. Lydia sat down with the balloon and felt of it carefully.

"Aren't balloons the most wonderful things, almost as wonderful as bubbles," she murmured. "I love the smell of them. Think what they can do, how they can float, better than birds! How you want to squeeze them but you don't dast! I'd rather have gone to the circus than to heaven."

In a moment she heard steps and greetings and her father leading his friend into the house. Then she slipped down the stairs and into the night. A dozen times she ran up and down the yard, the balloon like a fettered bird tugging at her wrist.

"I love it as much as little Patience does," she murmured. "Oh, I wish it was mine."

Finally, she ran out of the gate and up the street to the one fine house of which the street boasted. She stole up to the door and fastened the string of the balloon to the door bell, gave the bell a jerk and fled.

"Well, I haven't anything pleasant at all to look forward to now," she thought. "The circus parade is over and I've returned the balloon. Gee, yes, there is too! I didn't eat my cake yet!"

She turned up the lamp in the kitchen and foraged in the cake box, bringing out the cake Lizzie had saved for her. With this in her hand she entered the dining room. An extraordinary long, thin man was stretched out in one armchair, Amos in the other.

"You ought to sit in the parlor, dad," said Lydia, reproachfully.

"It's too stuffy," said Amos.

"Oh, hello, young Lydia!" said the tall man. "Come here and let me look at you."

Levine drew the child to his knee. She looked with a clear affectionate gaze on his thin smooth-shaven face, and into his tired black eyes.

"Why do you always say 'young Lydia?" asked the child.

"That's what I want to know, too," agreed Amos.

"Because, by heck! she's so young to be such an old lady." He smoothed the short curly hair with a gesture that was indescribably gentle. "I tell you what, young Lydia, if you were ten years older and I were ten years younger—"

Lydia leaned against his knee and took a large bite of cake. "You'd take me traveling, wouldn't you, Mr Levine?" she said, comfortably.

"You bet I would, and you should have your heart's desire, whatever that might be, if any one deserves it, you do, young Lydia."

Amos nodded and Lydia looked at them both with a sort of puzzled content as she munched her cake.

"I brought a newly illustrated copy of 'Tom Sawyer' for you to see, Lydia," said Levine. "Keep it as long as you want to. It's over on the couch there."

Lydia threw herself headlong on the book and the two men returned to the conversation she had interrupted.

"My loan from Marshall comes due in January," said Amos. "My lord, I've got to do something."

"He's a skin, Marshall is. Why does he live on this street except to save money?"

Lydia looked up from "Tom Sawyer." There were two little lines of worry between her eyes and the little sick sense in the pit of her stomach that always came when she heard money matters discussed. Her earliest recollection was of her mother frantically striving to devise some method of meeting their latest loan.

"I'd like to get enough ahead to buy a little farm. All my folks were farmers back in New Hampshire and I was a fool ever to leave quit it. It looked like a mechanic could eat a farmer up, though; when I was a young fellow. Now a little farm looks good enough to me. But on a dollar-and-a-half-a-day, I swan—" Amos sighed.

"Land's high around here," said Levine. "I understand Marshall sold Eagle farm for a hundred dollars an acre. Takes a sharp farmer to make interest on a hundred an acre. Lord—when you think of the land on the reservation twenty miles from here, just yelling for men to farm it and nothing but a bunch of dirty Indians to take advantage of it."

"Look here, John," said Amos with sudden energy. "It's time that bunch of Indians moved on and gave white men a chance. I wouldn't say a word if they farmed the land, but such a lazy, lousy outfit!"

"Poor brutes of Indians," said John Levine, refilling his pipe. "I get ugly about the reservation, yet I realize they've got first right to the land."

"Poor Brutes of Indians," Said John Levine.

"The man that can make best use of the land's got first right to it," insisted Amos. "That's what my ancestors believed two hundred and fifty years ago when they settled in New Hampshire and put loopholes under the eaves of their houses. Our farmhouse had loopholes like that. Snow used to sift in through 'em on my bed when I was a kid."

Lydia, lying on her stomach on the couch, turning the leaves of "Tom Sawyer," looked up with sudden interest.

"Daddy, let's go back there to live. I'd love to live in a house with loopholes."

The two men laughed. "You should have been a boy, Lydia," said Amos.

"A boy," sniffed Levine, "and who'd have mothered little Patience if she'd been a boy?"

"That's right—yet, look at that litter on the desk in the parlor."

Both the men smiled while Lydia blushed.

"What are you going to do with that doll furniture, Lydia?" asked John Levine.

"I'm going to make a doll house for little Patience, for Christmas." Lydia gave an uncomfortable wriggle. "Don't talk about me so much."

"You're working a long way ahead," commented Amos. "That was your mother's trait. I wish I'd had it. Though how I could look ahead on a dollar-and-a-half-a-day — Lydia, it's bedtime."

Lydia rose reluctantly, her book under her arm.

"Don't read upstairs, child," Amos went on; "go to bed and to sleep, directly."

Lydia looked around for a safe place for the book and finally climbed up on a chair and laid it on the top shelf of the sideboard. Then she came back to her father's side and lifted her face for her good-night kiss.

"Good-night, my child," said Amos.

"How about me," asked Levine. "Haven't you one to spare for a lonely bachelor?"

He pulled Lydia to him and kissed her gently on the cheek. "If you were ten years older and I were ten years younger—"

"Then we'd travel," said the child, with a happy giggle as she ran out of the room.

THE ALUMINUM GYRATATOR CREATES AN UNUSUALLY TURBULENT WATER ACTION

NO WATER LINE
THE MAYTAG TUB CAN BE FILLED TO THE BRIM

THE scientific design of the Maytag cast-aluminum tub, together with the gyratator action, creates an unusually cleansing, more turbulent water condition in every inch of the tub all of the time. A water action that puts every drop of water—every bit of soap suds at work.

This more cleansing water action, found only in the Maytag, washes clothes clean in half the usual time—washes bigger tubfuls in but 3 to 7 minutes. Does a whole washing—50 pounds of clothes (dry weight) in one short hour. Washes everything without hand-rubbing—even collars, cuffs and wristbands.

The Maytag has no waterline. A few pieces are washed just as effectively in a pailful of water as a big tubful of clothes are washed with the tub filled to the brim with water.

Phone the nearest Maytag dealer! Use a Maytag in your own home without obligation or expense. Test it thoroughly. Compare it with other washers. If the Maytag doesn't sell itself, don't keep it.

LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE SERVICE CHANGES

Effective October 1, 1926

Reductions in Long Distance Rates to Points Outside Michigan

To points outside Michigan that are 150 miles or more distant, Long Distance rates will be reduced substantially—the greater the distance, the greater the reduction. For example, from Detroit to St. Louis the basic station-to-station rate will be $2.30 instead of $3.00; to Denver, $5.25 instead of $7.40; to San Francisco, $9.30 instead of $13.45; to New York, $2.40 instead of $3.15. Reductions in rates from this city will be in like proportions.

Rates for distances between 24 and 110 miles will be adjusted, in many cases, to make the schedule consistent throughout, but in these cases any increase of the basic station-to-station (Anyone) rate will be only five cents.

Reversed Charges on Station-to-Station (Anyone) Calls

Heretofore the reversal of charges has been available only on person-to-person (Particular Person) calls. As a further convenience to the public, this privilege will be extended to station-to-station (Anyone) calls where the rate is 25 cents or more, both to points outside of Michigan and between points within the state.

Longer Reduced Rate Period

Reduced rate hours for station-to-station (Anyone) calls, both to Michigan points and to outside points, will begin at 7:00 p. m., instead of 8:30 p. m. as formerly. Between 7:00 p. m. and 8:30 p. m., the discount will be approximately 25 per cent of the day station-to-station (Anyone) rates; from 8:30 p. m. to 4:30 a. m., the discount will be about 50 per cent of the day rates. These discounts will apply where the day station-to-station (Anyone) rate is 40 cents or more, with a minimum reduced rate of 35 cents. Because of the unsatisfactory service conditions which it brought about, the midnight discount still in effect on calls to points outside Michigan will be discontinued.

The net result of these rate changes will be a saving to the telephone users of the United States of approximately $3,000,000 a year. The service changes are made in the interests of public convenience, to relieve the burden now imposed by the congestion of business at midnight and to furnish still better long distance service.

Reductions and adjustments in long distance rates between points within the state became effective July 10.

Mrs. Tom White and daughters, Jane and Lucile, from Hale, Michigan, Mr. and Mrs. C. Close of Toledo, Ohio, and Ed. Torry and daughter, Frances, of Indianapolis, were guests of the Ogden family a few days this week.

Dr. C. J. Winder and daughter, Evelyn, and Chris Davison of Eaton Rapids, accompanied by Miss Irene Auld of Charlotte, spent the week end in the city visiting relatives, returning to their respective homes Tuesday morning.

Uncle Geo. H. VanPelt and daughter, Mrs. Vuccassovich, leave on Monday of next week for Magnolia, Mass., where Mr. VanPelt will spend some time at his daughter's home. They will make the trip by auto, visiting at various places enroute.

Mrs. K. A. Usher and daughter, Ardis, returned Tuesday from Grand Rapids and Muskegon, where they have been visiting relatives for the past ten days. They motored up with Mrs. Thurlow King, who will spend a few days with relatives in Charlevoix and East Jordan.

Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Mills were very pleasantly surprised Saturday, when four of their cousins, whom they had not seen for 23 years, dropped in to pay them a call. They were Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Humphry, Mrs. Lewis Humphry and Mrs. Edith Lamb of Royal Oak. They came by the way of Gaylord and Boyne City, and returned Monday by the way of M-11.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Todd, who have been spending the past three months in their cottage across the arm from Ironton, leave Monday next for their home in Dixon, Ill. They will make the trip by auto, driving to Ludington, thence across the lake to Milwaukee by boat, and from there over the splendid cement road to Chicago, and home.

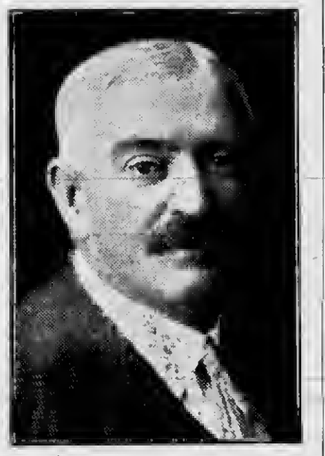
Northern Michigan Needs Men Like Cal Campbell

Square, Two-Fisted Fighter, Who Will Take off His Coat and Do Things for Northern Michigan Can Help Tremendously in Next Few Years.

With the future uf Nurthern Michigan considerably brighter than it has been for many years, in fact brighter than it has ever been, a great deal depends upon the action of the state this year. Much depends on the attitude of the state toward this great playground and therefore, a great deal depends upon who the voters send to Lansing for the next two years to represent this district.

Northern Michigan needs big business men to handle its affairs. It needs men who ure willing to sacrifice their own interests to some extent, in order that Northern Michigan may progress. It needs men with vision, men with bruins and men with that spirit of aggressiveness that will cause the state to become active in this development, now.

Northern Michigan's development is just beginning. There are muny things the state could and should do to help in this greut undertaking. The matter of opening up resort property by new roads, would have more to do with the progress of this section of the state in the next five years, thnn anything else so far proposed.



For State Senator
"Cal" Campbell
of Indian River

To what extent the state becomes interested in this development depends entirely upon the man who will represent this section in the senate.

For 48 years Cal Campbell hus lived in Northern Michigan. During all of these years he has watched, loped and helped Northern Michigan advance. He has been an active wnrker. He has been a developer. Year after year he has given his best efforts to the progress of this section of the state. In addition, he has developed from nothing but a hole in the ground, one of the most important business enterprises in this section of the stute. the Campbell Stone Co. at Afton.

Cal Campbell is a big business man. He is therefore a man of keen judgment, a square shooter whose word is as good as his bond. Startling years and years ago as a young man on the Michigan Central Railroad, Cal Campbell worked his way up to Conductor, only because he was fair, square and honest.

Later, he started in the stone business in a limited way. While he was on the railroad, he was chosen by his fellow workman tu formulate an organization that would help them in their negotiations for wnge increases. He did and the result was the formation of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. This organization has continued through the years and has spread from division to division and from one railruad to another until today, it covers every railroad in the world.

Back at that time, Cal Campbell was working in the interests uf his fellow men. He was a keen thinker and a worker, us will be recognized when it is known that fullowing the formation of the brotherhood, he was elected chairman uf the grievance committee whose duties were many and varied. One of the most important tasks he had to perform was submitting to the railroad a request for more pay for the entire body of trainmen. This request resulted in the first pay schedule ever submitted. The practice has remained through the years. Cal Campbell still holds his membership in the Brotherhood to this day.

As a railroad man all the workmen liked him and put their faith in him. for he was honest, friendly and square with all. When he started the stone business his workmen joined the organization and worked hard to help in his success. Has Mr. Campbell forgotten them? No sir! They swear by him at the plant and all over the north. Old, old men who have worked for years nre still drawing their pay although their work produces considerably less than what younger men could produce, but they stay on with Cal Campbell, for he knows the workers' side of life, und when they get too old to work they get pensioned.

But he also knows business. He has tuken the stone quarry at Afton nnd from a mere hole in the ground has step by step, builded up one of the finest stone plants in this section of the stnte. Duriog all this time, Mr. Campbell personally looked after the interests of the business und took care of its progress. Notwithstanding this he always had time to do his pnrt for his community and his friends.

In making the race for the senutorship, Mr. Campbell has not done so out of his own ambitions. He had no thoughts of entering politics. He had no thoughts of becoming a candidate, but his friends throughout the district, realizing the opportunity of sending a big business man to Lansing, to represent this district, prevailed upon Mr. Campbell, after a time, to finally make the race.

He did not then immediately enter the contest. There were other candidates who had been proposed nnd Mr. Campbell made a tour of the district on two or three occasion. On each, he was assured of hearty support from those who were interested in the development of this great north country nnd finally after careful study, and assurance from all over the district, he entered the campaign.

If elected to the office of State Senator, the people of this grent playground will come to know more intimately, one of the squarest, most enterprising, and most likeable men in this section of the state and they will come to know also, the value of sending to Lansing to represent this district, a man whose word has never been questioned. A man who will stand squarely in the middle of the road and fight for the things that will muke northern Michigan blossom into the great playground that is beginning to develop at this time. A vote for Cal Campbell on Sept. 14, is a vote for the development of northern Michigan.—Adv. 36t1

Palace Will Sbow New Bebe Daniels' Comedy

A sparkling, rollicking comedy, laid in the society atmosphere of Palm Beach and other Florida beauty spots, glorified by the bewitching presence and humorous antics of Bebe Daniels, and depending for its thrills upon speedboat racing is what picture-goers may expect to see at the Palace Theatre next Saturday and Sunday, when "The Palm Beach Girl" begins a two-days' run. September 11 and 12.

"Say It Again" September 17

"Say It Again," which comes to the Paluce Theatre September 17, is the third romantic farce in a row for Richard Dix, under the directorship of Gregory La Cuva. And it ia funnier and faster than either of the other two successes, "Let's Get Married" and "Womanhandled."

"Graustark" Is New Triumph for Norma

"Graustark" has come ta life!

The magic witchery of intrigue and romance which flowed so freely from the pen of Georgo Barr McCutcheon has been imbued with the colors of reality and Graustark, the kingdom, and the story, lives upon the screen.

And it is fitting that of all filmdom's great, Norma Talmadge should appear in the starring role as the lovely and loveable Princess Yetive.

At Palace Theatre, September 15 to 16.

County Fair, September 14, 15, 16

Have you thought about your exhiblts for the fair. Time is short and plan now. This fair is for you and why not show visitors that Charlevoix county is on the map. Besides advertising your products. Among other features there will be the Calf Club exhibit, Cow-test exhibit, Big Livestock parade and fireworks. Surely you have crops, frults, vegetables or livestock you are anxious to display. All judging will ba conducted on the 15th. Big parade on same day, as well as the P. B. Guernsey being given away by the People's State Savings Bank of East Jordan at noon. Remember the 15th is the big day. Plan to exhlbit and learn from the judges the types you should have.

What Is a Diuretic?

People Are Learning the Value of Occasional Use.

EVERYONE knows that a laxative stimulates the bowels. A diuretic performs a similar function to the kidneys. Under the strain of our modern life, our organs are apt to become sluggish and require assistance. More and more people are learning to use Doan's Pills, occasionally, to insure good elimination which is so essential to good health. More than 50,000 grateful users have given Doan's signed recommendations. Scarcely a community but has its representation. Ask your neighbor!

Labor Leaders Endorse Frank D. Scott as True to Their Organizations

Letter Showing How Congressman From This District Acted and Worked With Labor Leaders Is Published Below.

That organized labor in this section of Michigan has a true friend in Washington in Congressman Frnnk D. Seott, is elearly evideneed in a personal letter direct from one of the greatest labor leaders in the United States, Andrew Furuseth, President of the International Seamen's Union of Amerieа. Mr. Furuseth without hesitation plainly states that Mr. Scott has given organized labor, every possible assistanee and courtesy. He goes so far as to express his appreciation to Mr. Seott for his efforts in behalf of organized labor.

The Letter follows:

International Seamen's Union of America

Andrew Furuseth, President,
Rooms 409-10 A. F. of L. Bldg.
Washington, D. C.
Cable address:

Cable Address:
Seamanship Chieago.

Washington, D. C., May 21, 1926.

Hon. Frank D. Scott, Chairman.
Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Congressman:

Replying to your letter asking for an expression from me as to the treatment accorded the seamen presenting their case before the committee on any question brought before it affecting them, I can say that we have been accorded every opportunity to present our side fully before your Committee and we have been given courteous treatment in the presentntion of our ease.

I will further state that we hnve no possible eomplaint in any way of the manner in whieh you have conducted the Committee during your term as Chairmnn.

Very truly yours,
ANDREW FURUSETH.

Knowing thnt Frank D. Seott is friendly to labor and that he is lending every support to the organization leaders, as is clearly stated in the above letter, it would appear that the working people of this great district could not afford to take a chanee in the eleetion of its congressman. The publie knows where Frank D. Scott stands. The workers know from the above letter how the labor leaders at Washington regard him and when an endorsement, such as is given above, coming directly from one of the greatest labor leaders in the country, it would appear a good, safe bet that Seott can be entrusted with the working man's interests. Changes are not always beneficial and now that labor has a man in Washington who is friendly, one who is interested and one who has proven his support of their interests, it hardly would pay to take a ehance. The ehange might be benefieial and then again, it might not, but with Frank D. Seott in Washington, the people know he has their interests at heart and that they have a friend. They are taking no ehanees therefore in returning him to congress and your vote on Sept. 14 will help return Scott to congress. —Adv. 36t1

VAUGHN SPIKES PERSISTENT RUMOR

Wants Voters to Fully Understand His Position

Dave Vaughn, of Boyne City, candidate for the office of sheriff, is somewhat ruffled over a persistent rumor concerning his intentions if nominated and elected to the office he seeks.

Rumor has it that if elected he will make his home in Boyne City. The rumor he says, confronts him every day and everywhere. He wants it distinctly understood, that if nominated and elected his home will be in Charlevoix, in the county jail building where Sheriff Novak now lives, and that he will be on the job every minute, day and night.

Rumors of this kind are disheartening to any candidate, whether it is Vaughn or someone else. People do not understand, or do not stop to think, how foolish it would be for a candidate for sheriff, or any other county office for that matter, where their services are needed here, to try to be elected under such conditions.

If Vaughn is the people's choice for sheriff, he will live in Charlevoix. He couldn't very well do anything else. No matter who is elected, they will live in Charlevoix, where they belong. Voters can rest assured of this fact.

FIND LIFELESS BODY FLOATING IN LAKE

Wife of East Jordan Pastor Meets Untimely End

The body of Mrs. Essy Sidebotham, wife of the Rev. C. W. Sidebotham, pastor of the Presbyterian church at East Jordan, was found early Wednesday morning of last week in the waters of the south arm of Pine Lake near the bridge.

Mrs. Sidebotham had been in ill health for over a year and recently underwent an operation. She seemed to be in a normal condition Tuesday evening when she retired. Shortly after daybreak, Wednesday, her husband went to her room only to find her missing. Search was immediately started which resulted in finding her lifeless body near the bridge. Her body was fully clothed and on a nearby abutment were found her glasses and a magazine.

Deceased is survived by the bereaved husband and two daughters, Elizabeth, aged 17 years, and Gertrude, aged nine. She was a sister of Mrs. W. W. Mitchell of this city. Funeral services were held on Thursday last, the remains being taken to Alma for burial.

One-fourth off on watches, jewelry and cut glass. See window display. C. R Bellinger.—Adv. 3613

SHOCKLEY REUNION HELD ON LABOR DAY

Children and Grandchildren Assemble for Week End

A very happy reunion of the Shockley family was held at the home of Mrs. Ada M. Shockley, when all of her children, grand-children and other members of the family assembled over the week end of Labor Day for an old-fashioned visit with their mother, and sister, Mrs. H. I. Ochs.

An extensive program had been prepared for their entertainment, but owing to the bad weather, much of this had to be omitted.

Those from out of town were: W. A. Shockley, wife and two suns, Bobbie and Jack, of Menominee; Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Ladd and son, Edward, of Pontiac; Mr. and Mrs. M. V. Breitmayer and son, William Frederick, of Jackson; Miss Grace Shockley of Sequanota; Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Saville and Mr. and Mrs. Carl Johnson (Leota Saville), of Kalamazoo. Only one member of the family, Harry W. Ladd, was absent.

O. Nordrum.

The citizen who neglects to vote is ofttimes the first to criticize the acts of our public officials. Don't let this be said about you.

THIS LABOR ORGANIZATION DOES NOT ENDORSE FRANK D. SCOTT FOR CONGRESSMAN AND STATES THE REASON WHY

The following article taken from Labor, a national weekly newspaper, published at Washington, D. C., takes a wallop at Congressman Frank D. Scott that should make him sit up and take notice. Laboring men in the 11th Congressional District should read this carefully and then vote for the man endorsed. Bohn has a clean record and should be given the full labor vote. The article referred to follows:

Scott's "Labor Record"

To the Editor of LABOR:

The Progressive voters of the Eleventh Michigan district have been trying for years to bring about the defeat of Congressman Frank Scott. This year, they have indorsed State Senator F. P. Bohn, who has a splendid record. The chances for defeating Scott appear to be very good, but his supporters are playing up his labor record, stating that he voted 90 per cent with labor on all legislation indorsed by the workers. Please give us the facts.

Escanaba, Mich. C. C.

It is a good deal of a joke for a man like Congresman Scott to talk about his "labor record."

Scott was on the people's side when he entered the House. LABOR urged his re-election in 1920. The next year, at the suggestion of the Great Lakes ship owners, Scott sought to destroy the La Follette Seamen's Act, and began voting with the "Old Guard" on general legislation. LABOR, therefore, opposed him in 1922 and 1924.

As an example of the way he "stands by labor," it should be remembered that when the Howell-Barkley bill was before the House, Scott did what he could to kill it.

He should be defeated, not alone on his labor record, but because he is in every way unfit to represent an intelligent constituency.

CADDY TOURNAMENT CLOSED LAST WEEK

GLENN GILL WON FIRST FLIGHT —BILLY NOVAK RUNNER-UP

Willard Smith and Robert McCall Won Prizes in Second Flight— Efficiency Prizes Awarded

About the end of this week will wind up the activities at the Charlevoix Golf Club for the 1926 season, which, considering the short resort season, has been up to the average. Around forty players are still pursuing their favorite sport eech day, compared with better than two hundred two weeks ago.

Numerous chnnges mnde last fall and spring on the lay-out of the course were highly commended by the players. Among the improvements were new trappings over the entire eighteen holes, and the new, modern sprinkling system installed, kept the greens nnd fairways in excellent playing condition throughout tho season.

The annual caddy tournament played off last week was of more thnn usual interest, the youthful club-toters turning in scores that would make the seasoned golfer tnke notice. Glenn Gill was winner of the first flight, thereby receiving the $16 prize, after taking an interesting match from Bill Novnk, runner-up, who wons the $5 secnad prize. Willard Smith outplayed Robert McCall for first money in the second flight, the boys getting $5 nnd $3 respectively.

Efficiency and conduct prizes, given the three caddies maintnining the highest stnndard of work and behavior throughout the season, were awarded to Victor Smith, 1st prize, $10; Harold Newman, 2nd prize, $5; and Robert McCall, 3rd prize, $3.

The annual caddy excursion, held on Saturday, September 4th, provided a two-day trip to Mackinac Island on the steamer Manitou for eighty-five boys, with nll expenses paid by members of the Chicago Club, as a rewnrd for their faithful and efficient conduct at the links during the current season. The boys had e very enjoynble trip and feel truly rewerded for their efforts this summer.

A considerable sum of money was given by members of the Chicago Club to those caddies presenting their savings pass books to the caddy mnster nt the end of the season, the sum of ten per cent being ndded to their savings. With this inducement and other measures taken by the Cherlevoix Golf Club to bring up the standard of service emong caddies serving the links, the boys were given every reason to put forth their best efforts.

RECOVER STOLEN MOTORS AT CHEBOYGAN

Three Truck Loads Taken by Officers of Northern City,

Two Johnson outboard motors, stolen this summer from the boathouse of Jas. I. Disette, Indianapolis summer resorter, and the other from a Mr. Burnham of the Chicago Club, were recovered at Cheboygan, last Friday by officers of that city, and were returned to their owners Monday by M. Roy Brady, who went to Cheboygan and identified the stolen property.

Cheboygan officers have arrested and placed in jail a man and two women who had been occupying a cottage near that city. Three truck loads of stolen gooda were recovered, probably just in time, for the contrabrand had been boxed and labelled for shipment to Detroit. Everything imaginable was ineluded in the list from fishing tackle, guns, tents, etc., to silverware, electric fixtures and household goods. It is thought that the robbers had been working in northern resorts throughout the entire summer.

Credit for the arrest is due a Mr. Denny, caretaker of the state game preserve at Cecil Bay, who had been trailing the culprits for several weeks. He had become suspicious of the cottagers when he noticed them having a large supply of outboard motors and camping equipment at their house, and finally notified officers from Cheboygan who made the arrest.

Local people and summer resorters who have had property stolen this summer, may find them in the large amount of goods recovered.

SERIOUS FIRE AT PETOSKEY

THREE LEADING STORES LOSE IN EARLY MORNING BLAZE

Stores Damaged Among the Old Established Business Places of City—Loss Is Heavy

Petoskey was visited with a serious fire early Wednesday morning last, when flames gutted the Monerch Cigar store and barber shop, and ceused heevy weter nnd smoke loss to the Welling Department store and heavy smoke loss to the Beese & Porter dry goods store, all on Mitchell street. Damage is only partially covered by insurance.

The fire was discovered at about one o'clock by a passerby, who heard the crackling of flames and felt the hent when passing the stores. The flumes are believed to have started in the rear of the cigar store and soon renched the first nnd second floors of the building. Both first nnd second floors were badly damaged by fire and water and smoke. Stocks in the cigar store and bnrber shop nre n total loss, and the fixtures badly burned and scarred.

Watar covered the floors of the basement and both stories of the Welling Department store immediately adjolning the cigar store. Tho Beese & Portcr store, further east, also was filled with smoke and the management reports praetically all the stock damaged. The News Printing Co. suffered considerable loss from smoko and water, whieh damaged their stock of fine paper and other supplies.

The stores dameged are among the old established business places of the city with patrons from all over upper Michigan. The buildings were owned by Hankey brothers.

GREEN CARRIES STATE BY OVER 125,000 MAJORITY

"KEEP MICHIGAN GREEN" SEEMS TO HAVE BEEN VERY POPULAR SLOGAN

Frank P. Bohn Defeats Frank D. Scott in Race for Congressional Honors—Campbell Winner in Senatorial Race —Returns from Entire County

"Keep Michigan Green" seemed to be a slogan that took the fancy of Michigan voters at yesterday's primary election, judging from the vote given Fred A. Green of Ionia, candidate for this office opposing the present incumbent, Alex J. Groesbeck.

Incomplete returns give Green a majority in the stnte of over 125,000. Wnyne county, the Groesbeck stronghold, gave the governor u nice majority, but not enough to overcome the avalanche of votes from every corner of the state. The upper peninsula, which has always given Groesbeck n big majority, went three to one for Green. Charlevoix county gave Green a majority of 2028.

For lieutenant-governor, precincts necounted for in the state give Luren D. Dickinson a lead of over 20,000 safely insuring his election.

In the fight for congressionnl honors in the 11th district, Frank P. Bohn of Newberry, defeated the present incumbent, Frank D. Scott of Alpenn, who is now serving his sixth term, by a majority of over 2,000. Charlevoix county gave Scott a majority of 57. Bohn led in practicnlly nll rural precincts and carried the city of Charlevoix by 149.

Early returns indicated that Bohn would enrry the county, but heavy Scott majorities from Boyne City and two wards in East Jordan, reduced his lead.

In the three-cornered race for senatorial honors, Cal. Campbell of Indian River, defeated his opponents by a safe majority. Dr. Hugh W. Dicken, of East Jordan, received 1855 votes in Charlevoix county against Campbell 719 and Hinkley 827. His leed however, was not enough to overcome the strong eastern support of Campbell. Campbell received the largest number of votes in the district, with Dicken second and Hinkley third.

For the first time in years a candidate from the eastern part of the county won out for sheriff, es was also true in the rnce for county clerk. When the final count was made, David Vaughn of Boyne City was found to be the winner by n majority of 705 votes over his nearest opponent, Henry W. Fike of Boyne Falls. Georga A. Roderick of Boyne City was winner in the contest for county clerk by a majority of 471 votes over his nearest opponent.

The elosest eontest in the primary election was between A. L. Fitch and Rollie L. Lewis for prosecuting attorney. At no time was there over a hundred and fifty votes between the two. The result was that Fiteh was re-elected by a majority of 110.

ENGAGEMENT ANNOUNCED AT BRIDGE PARTY

Miss Myrtle Guild to Become Bride of Theodore S. Kibbe

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Guild entertained Wednesday and Thursdny evenings with a luncheon and hridge party in honor of their daughter, Myrtle, and at that time announced her engagement to Theodore S. Kibbe, well known local young man.

The home was very prettily decorated for the oecesion and tables were arranged with dainty place cards, sweet peas and green candles. Much to Miss Myrtle's surprise, her brother, Jule R. Guild, presented her the shower in a very pretty baby eab.

Mrs. Glenn See and Miss Genevieve Supernaw carried off first honors at bridge, with Mrs. Oakley Hammond and Musa Richardson winning consolation honors. The occasion was greatly enjoyed by all.

PETOSKEY TRAFFIC OFFICER BADLY HURT

Found Unconscious on Road East of Harbor Springs

Darrel Cosgrove, Petoskey's traffic officer and also a deputy sheriff whose duties include the patrolling of state paved highways in Emmet county, was found unconscious last Saturday morning on the pnvement just east of Harbor Springs. His akull was fractured, several ribs broken and his hody covered with cuts and bruises. His wrecked machine was found nearby.

It is believed Cosgrove's machine skidded while he was driving at considerable speed and that the officer was thrown violently to the pavement and dragged some distance before the machine stopped. When found he was lying against the guard rail of the road. The rear tire of his machine hed been punctured or had blown out, end it is thought this may have caused the accident.

Cosgrove was from Detroit, and came to northern Michignn with his wife end children in a fight to regain her failing health. He was well liked nnd an efficient officer.

PICTURE TAKING IS HIS HOBBY

CHARLEVOIX IS INDEBTED TO "UNCLE" LOUIE WINTERNITZ

Scenes Donated by Him Have Made Our Advertising Matter Unusually Attractivo

The question is often asked, not only hy Charlevoix residents, but also summer people, "where do we obtain the beautiful views of Chnrlevoix and vicinity that appear in the hooklets nnd advertising matter put out ench year."

A large number of the views used in Chnrlevoix advertising for the last three years were given to the city by "Uncle" Louie Winternitz, for n number of years a member of our summer colony. "Uncle" Loule's hobby is taking pitcures. He knows how to take pictures and has tnken hundreds of Charlevoix scenes. Many of his pictures adorn the walls of our homes and hundreds of copies have been bought by summer people.

The worth of his pictures is not confined to Charlevoix by any menns. A collection of his Indian pictures were eagerly sought by the Museum of American Indians, New York, the Field Museum, Chicago, nnd the Florida State Museum at Gainsville, Florida. Five of his pictures taken at our recent Indian picnic aro now on display in these institutions.

Trees and beach scenes especially appeal to him and he has hundreds taken in Charlevoix. He spends the summers here—taking pictures. During the winter he is in Florida—riding his hobby. He is a great lover of Nature and has the natural gift of knowing how, when, and where to take a picture.

Charlevoix's 1927 booklet will contain many of "Uncle" Louie's pictures that have never before appeared in print. His co-operation has been a wonderful help to those in charge of Charlevoix's publicity. Make it a point to meet him and thank him personally for the part he has taken in putting Charlavoix on the map as the leading playground of the north.

ENGINEER OF SYLVIA WAS NEARLY DROWNED

Rescued in Unconscious Condition by Members of Crew

Joseph A. Webb, of Petoskey, engineer on Logan Thomson's yecht, Sylvia, narrowly escaped drowning Monday evening when he fell from the dock to which the yacht was tied.

Members of the Sylvia's crew were attracted by a splash at the side of the boat, and, upon investigating, found Webb in the water. He could not explain how he happened to fall or whether he fell from the gang plank or the dock, and was unconscious for nearly an hour after being rescued. It is believed he struck the side of the boat when falling, being injured about his side and face, and receiving a cut over his eye.

A doctor was called to care for the injured man and he was removed to his home in Petoskey, Tuesday.

CORN UP TO 10 YEAR AVERAGE

AUGUST SHOWS SLIGHT INCREASE IN CROP CONDITIONS

All Crops Are Two Weeks Later Than Usual—Early Frosts Will Cause Heavy Losses

Nearly all Michigan crops made some improvement during the month of August. Corn is now up to the ten-year average and, with the exception of hay, beans and oats which nre slightly below the average, all other crops are above normal according to the September report issued by L. Whitney Watkins, Commissioner of Agriculture nnd Verne H. Churcb, U. S. Agricultural Statistician for Michigan. Heavy rains caused some damage to beans, potatoes, sugar beets and grain in the shock in the east-central counties, but generally favorable conditions prevailed elsewhere. All crops are about two weeks later than usual and the month of September without a severe frost is needed to bring the principal ones to satisfactory maturity.

Corn: The crop made a gain of eight per cent during August nnd a fairly good crop is looked for in southern Michigan if no killing frost occurs during September. It has also made decided improvement in the northern districts and the more advanced fields give good promise. The crop is estimated at 52,499,000 bushels in comparison with a production of 65,680,000 bushels in 1925.

The country's estimated production is 2,697,872,000 bushels, a gain of over 100 millions since the previous report and about 200 millions less than the 1925 crop.

Spring Wheat: In northern counties many fields were struck with rust resulting in considerable injury. The condition is 80 per cent of normal which indicates a crop of 86,000 bushels, or four thousand less than last year.

Oats: In the northern districts much of the crop was short and light. Many fields were badly rusted and some were cut for hay instead of grain. A considerable quantity in central and southern districts were injured in the shock by rains, resulting in discoloration of the grnin nnd occasional instances of sprouting. The condition of 80 per cent is two per cent below the average nnd represents a production of 54,667,000 bushels, as compared with 53,248,000 in 1925.

Barley: The grain was discolored to some extent by rains while standing in the shock. Yields range from fnir to good, nveraging around 27 bushels per acre. The estimated production is 3,450,000 bushels as compared with 3,087,000 last year.

Buckwheat: Weather conditions hnve been favorable in most sections and the crop has mnde considerable improvement during the past month. The condition is reported at 85 per cent which is five per cent above the average. The production outlook is for a crop of 818,000 bushels against 754,000 last yenr.

Beans: Severe damage from heavy rains has occurred during the past month in portions of the Saginaw valley nnd "Thumb" district. There is some blight in nearly all parts of the state. Harvesting did not begin until September 1 as the crop is fully two weeks later than usual in ripening. The condition is rated at 71 per cent, 11 per cent below last year and one per cent below the average, and is equivalent to a production of 6,321,000 bushels. The condition in the east-central district dropped from 70 to 58 per cent during August.

Potato: The condition of 82 per cent is the same as one month ago. The crop is in a thrifty condition in all districts except small, local areas, and the growth is sntisfactory. The early crop was rather light in many sections although fair to good in some counties. The present outlook is for a crop of 28,585,000 bushels, or a little over four millions more than last year's. A little blight is reported and there has been some damage from heavy rains in east-central counties.

Fruits: The apple crop is estimated at 9,379,000 bushels, the condition being placed at 66 per cent. Of this amount, 1,626,000 barrels is rated as commercial. A special inquiry shows that approximately 51 per cent, or 829,000 barrels of the commercial production will be winter varieties. The fall varieties comprise 28 per cent and the sommer varieties, 21 per cent. Spies are very light; Baldwins, Greenings and McIntosh are only fair. Other winter and the fall varieties are more plentiful. The quality is good in the southwest counties. Farther north in the state, they not as large and scab is more prevalent.

LYDIA of the Pines

by HONORÉ WILLSIE

W.N.U. SERVICE

COPYRIGHT by FREDERICK A. STOKES CO.

CHAPTER I—Continued

There was silence for a moment, then John Levine said, "Too bad old Lizzie is such a slob."

"I know it," replied Amos, "but she gets no wages, just stayed on after nursing my wife. I can't afford to pay for decent help. And after all, she does the rough work, and she's honest and fond of the children."

"Still Lydia ought to have a better chance. I wish you'd let me—" he hesitated.

"Let you what?" asked Amos.

"Nothing. She'd better work out things her own way. She'll be getting to notice things around the house as she grows older."

"It is the devil's own mess here," admitted Amos. "I'm going to move next month. This place has got on my nerves. I've got to get into a place where I can have a garden. If we go further out of town we can get more land for less rent."

"It's a good idea to have a garden," said John Levine. "I tell you, take that cottage of mine out near the lake. I'll let you have it for what you pay for this. It'll be empty the first of September."

"I'll go you," said Amos. "It's as pretty a place as I know of."

Again silence fell. Then Amos said, "John, why don't you go to congress? Not today, or tomorrow, but maybe four or five years from now."

"Nice question for one poor man to put to another," said Levine, with a short laugh.

"No reason you should always be poor," replied Amos. "There's rich land lying twenty miles north of here, owned by nothing but Indians."

Levine scratched his head.

"You could run for sheriff," said Amos, "as a starter."

"By heck!" exploded John Levine. "I'll try for it. No reason why a real-estate man shouldn't go into politics as well as some of the shyster lawyers you and I know, huh, Amos?"

Upstairs, Lydia stood in a path of moonlight pulling off her clothes slowly. Having jerked herself into her nightdress, she knelt by the bedside.

"Oh God," she prayed in a whisper, "don't let there be any more deaths in our family and help me to bring little Patience up right." This was her regular formula.

Softly as a shadow she crept in beside her baby sister and the moonlight slowly edged across the room and rested for a long time on the two curly heads, motionless in childhood's slumber.

CHAPTER II

The Heroic Day

Little Patience had forgotten the red balloon, overnight. Lydia had known that she would. Nevertheless, with the feeling that something was owing to the baby, she decided to turn this Saturday into an extra season of delight for her little charge.

"Do you care, dad," asked Lydia, at breakfast, "if baby and I have lunch over at the lake shore?"

"Not if you're careful," answered Amos. He dug into his coat pocket and brought up a handful of tobacco from which he disinterred two pennies.

"Here," he said, "one for each of you. Don't be late for supper, chickens."

He kissed the two children, picked up his dinner pail and was off. Lydia, her red cheeks redder than usual, smiled at Lizzie, as she dropped the pennies into the pocket of her blouse and stuffed a gray and frowsy little handkerchief on top of them.

"Isn't he the best old daddy?" she exclaimed.

"Sure," said Lizzie absentmindedly, as she poured out her third cupful of coffee. "Lydia, that dress of yours is real dirty. You get into something else and I'll wash it out today."

"I haven't got much of anything else to get into, have I, Lizzie?—except my Sunday dress."

"You are dreadful short of clothes, child, what with the way you grow and the way you climb trees. I'm trying to save enough out of the grocery money to get you a couple more of them galatea dresses for when school opens, but land—your poor mother was such a hand with the needle, you used to look a perfect picture. "There," warned by the sudden droop of Lydia's mouth, "I tell you, you'll be in and out of the water all day, anyhow. Both of you get into the bathing suits your Aunt Emily sent you."

"All right," answered Lydia, soberly. "Wouldn't you think Aunt Emily would have more sense than to send all those grownup clothes? Who did she think's going to make 'em over, now?"

"I don't know, child. The poor thing is dead now, anyhow. Folks is always thoughtless about charity. Why I wasn't taught to sew, I don't know. Anyhow, the bathing suits she got special for you two."

"You bet your life, I'm going to learn how to sew," said Lydia, rising to untie the baby's bib. "I'm practicing on Florence Dombey. Mother had taught me straight seams and had just begun me on over and over, when—"

"Over and over," repeated the baby, softly.

Lizzie put out a plump, toil-scarred hand and drew Lydia to her. "There, dearie! Think about other things. What shall poor old Liz fix you for lunch?"

The child rubbed her bright cheek against the old woman's faded one "You are a solid comfort to me, Lizzie," she said with a sigh. Then after a moment she exclaimed, eagerly "Oh! Lizzie, do you think we could have a deviled egg? Is it too expensive?"

"You shall have a deviled egg if I have to steal it. But maybe you might dust up the parlor a bit while I get things ready."

Lydia established little Patience on the dining-room floor with a linen picture book, brought in a broom and dustpan from the kitchen and began furiously to sweep the parlor. When the dust cleared somewhat she emerged with the dustpan heaped with sweepings and the corners of the room still untouched. Then with a sense of duty well done, she lifted little Patience and curried her up into the little bedroom.

The bathing suits were pretty blue woolen things, and when the two presented themselves to Lizzie in the kitchen the old woman exclaimed, "Well, if ever I seen two fairies!"

"A thin one and a fat one," chuckled Lydia. "Push the baby carriage down over the steps for me, Lizzie, and I'll prepare for our long, hard voyage."

Patience was established in her perambulator with her linen picture book. Florence Dombay was settled at her feet, with "Men of Iron." The bits of cigar box and the knife packed in a pasteboard box were tied to one edge of the carriage. Patience's milk, packed in a tin pail of ice, was laid on top of "Men of Iron." The paper bag of lunch dangled from the handlebar and Lydia announced the preparations complete.

The way to the lake shore led under the maple trees for several blocks. Then the board walk turned abruptly to cross a marsh high-grown now with ripening cat-tails. Having safely crossed the marsh, the walk ended in a grass-grown path. Lydia trundled the heavy perambulator with some difficulty along the path. The August sun was hot. She panted. "You are getting fat, baby!' Darn it, I wish I had a bicycle!"

"Ahoy there! Hard aport with your helm, mate!" came a shout from behind her. A boy in a bright-red bathing suit jumped off a bicycle.

"Hallo, Kent!" said Lydia.

"Hello, yourself!" returned Kent. "Wait and I'll hitch to the front axle."

He untied a stout cord from his handle-bars and proceeded to fasten it from his saddle post to the perambulator. Lydia watched him with a glowing face. She was devoted to Kent, although they quarreled a great deal. He was a handsome boy, two years Lydia's senior; not tall for his years, but already broad and sturdy, with crinkly black hair and clear, black-lashed brown eyes. His face was round and ruddy under its summer tan. His lips were full and strong—an aggressive, jolly boy, with a quick temper and a generous heart. He and Lydia had been friends since kindergarten days.

"I'm going to stay in the Willows all day," said Lydia. "Don't go too fast, Kent."

"Git-up! Git-up, horsy!" screamed little Patience.

The path, after a few moments, shifted to the lake shore. The water there lapped quietly on a sandy beach, deep shaded by willows. Kent dismounted.

"Discharge your cargo!" he cried.

"Don't be so bossy," said Lydia. "This is my party."

"All right, then I won't play with you."

"Nobody asked you to, smarty. I was going to give you my deviled egg for lunch."

"Gosh," said Kent, "did you bring your lunch? Say, I guess I'll go home and get mother to give me some. But let's play pirates, first."

"All right! I choose to be chief first," agreed Lydia.

"And I'm the cannibal and baby's the stolen princess," said Kent.

The three children plunged into the game which is the common property of childhood. For a time, bloody captures, savage orgies, escape, pursuit, looting of great ships and burial of treasure, transformed the quiet shore to a theater of high crime. At last, as the August noon waxed high, and the hostage princess fell fast asleep in her perambulator cave, the cannibal, who had shifted to captured duke, bowed before the pirate.

"Sir," he said in a deep voice, "I have bethought myself of still further treasure which, if you will allow me to go after in my trusty boat, I will get and bring to you—if you will allow me to say farewell at that time to my wife and babes."

"That" returned the pirate, "How do I know you'll come back?"

The duke folded his arms. "You have my word of honor which never has, and never will, be broken."

"Go, duke, but return ere sundown." The pirate made a magnificent gesture toward the bicycle, "And say, Kent, bring plenty to fill yourself up, for I'm awful hungry and I'll need all we've got."

She was giving little Patience her bread and milk, when Kent returned with a paper bag.

"Ma was cross at me for pestering her, but I managed to get some sandwiches and doughnuts. Come on, let's begin. Gee, there's a squaw!"

Coming toward the three children seated in the sand by the perambulator was a thin bent old woman, leaning on a stick.

"Dirty old beggar," said Kent, beginning to devour his sandwiches.

"Isn't she awful!" exclaimed Lydia. Begging Indians were no novelty to Lake City children, but this one was so old and thin that Lydia was horrified. Toothless, her black hair streaked with gray, her calico dress unspeakably dirty, her hands like birds' claws clasping her stick, the squaw stopped in front of the children.

"Eat!" she said, pointing to her mouth, while her sunken black eyes were fixed on Kent's sandwiches.

Little Patience looked up and began to whimper with fear.

Life is what you make it. If you spend all you earn, you are making it pleasant for the present but doubtful for the future. If you spend less than you earn and save the difference, you are preparing for ease in later years. The decision is up to you. What are you going to do about it?

WORLD'S FASTEST CABLE NOW COMPLETED

Will Maintain Communications Between New York and London

Bobbing up an down from a ship anchored off Rockaway Beach there hove into sight a long string of black casks. Fastened to the nearest one was a rope the other end of which was attached to a huge winch mounted on a truck on shore. Round and round wound the winch and closer and closer eame the string of casks. Finally the first one reached the shore and clinging to its bottom was a slimy black wire. It was seized by 150 men, was drngged fan up on land, and buried in a deep trench at Hammels, N. Y.

Thus was landed the New York shore end of the world's fastest cable. It extends from New York to Bay Roberts, Newfoundland, whence it strikes out across the floor of the Atlantic to its terminus at Penzance, England, and thence to London. It crosses the undersea plateaus, tops the submarine mountains, and dips miles down into the deepest valleys.

The world's fastest cable, wrapped with permalloy which gives it its speed, was made by the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance company of Greenwich, England. This is the oldest company engaged in the manufacture of deep sea cables. It was formed for the purpose of laying the first successful trans-Atlantic cable which was completed in 1866. Following the failure of Cyrus Field's first Atlantic cable in 1858, that courageous American could raise no more funds in America. He accordingly had recourse to England where after lengthy negotiations he succeeded in raising sufficient capital to build and lay a new cable.

The Gutta Percha company which then had a practical monopoly of the necessary insulating material was given the order to build the new cable which was completed in 1865. The steamship Great Eastern, the largest craft ever built up to that time, was chartered to lay the new cable. It set to work and 1200 miles of the new cable had been pnid out when it parted and all efforts to recover it proved fruitless.

Once more Field's proect was threatened with ruin. At this critical juncture in cable history, however, John Pender, the head of the Gutta Percha compnny, came forward with the proposal to risk a quarter of a million pounds of his own money in the effort to carry out the project. The Gutta Percha company became the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance company. A new cable was made and enough additional to complete the 1865 cable. The Great Eastern was purchased and on the 13th of July, 1866, steamed into Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, trailing behind her a line of cable stretching continuously back to the Irish const. The shore end was landed safely and the Great Eastern steamed eastward again. It grappled for the lost end of the 1865 cable, recovered it, spliced on a new section, and on September 8 landed this also in Newfoundland.

Thus, instead of a single Atlantic cable there were two. Others were built and laid until today there are nineteen trans-Atlantic cables, eight of which are operated by the Western Union. This company also operates three to Cuba, one to Barbados and thence to South America, and one to the Azores and thence to Italy and Germany.

AFTERNOON AND EVENING SESSION

Charlevoix S. S. Association to Meet at Bayshore

The Charlevoix County Sunday School associntion is to meet September 28th, probably at Bny Shore for an afternoon and evening session. Further particulars next week.

The state Sunday school organization is now known as the Michigan Council of Religious Eduention. This council is sponsoring four great regional conferences this full.

Charlevoix county is included in the group meeting at Alpena October 4th to 6th, but our delegates may if they prefer, register for Cadillac October 13th to 15th. The registration fee is $1.00 and this entitles the delegntes to lodging and breakfast free. The best available speakers have been secured and the same program will be repeated at each conference.

Minerals for Cows

If cows receive legume hay—alfalfa, clover, soy beans or sweet clover—in winter, and are on good pasture in the summer; there is no danger of a lack of minerals, except perhaps with very heavy producers. If legume hays are not fed and for very heavy producing herds, it is recommended that two to four pounds of steamed bone meal, ground rock phosphate, finely ground limestone or wood ashes be fed with each 100 pounds of grain mixture.

JOHN NORDRUM STARTS MAKING IMPROVEMENTS

Will Have New Dock, Work Shop and Net Yard

John Nordrum is improving his property on the south side of Round Lake, near Booth Fisheries packing house.

The old boat house which formerly set at the water's edge has been moved to the back end of the lot and remodeled into a work shop. A new landing dock is under construction and piling has been driven in preparation for planking. Changes of this kind greatly improve the appearance of our water front and it would be well for others to follow Mr. Nordrum's example.

COMMUNICATION

Charlevoix, Mich., Sept. 5, 1926.

Mr. Editor: You know and I know that all those who have been ahead of the times in which he lived, has been harassed and persecuted and made little of because of their increasing devotion to any pet hobby that they may have accumulated. So it has been with me. In my case I have come off the victor. It was not because I had discovered or invented anything new, but for having examined and gone thoroughly into the merits of Good Concrete Roads, and of the needs of the people for transportation purposes, and the absolute durability of this road. I saw plainly that it was the only permanent road that could be built.

God Almighty made everything that was made and He called it good, and He gave to some men more intelligence than He did to others. It fell to the lot of men who had the greatest amount of brains (intelligence) to select the different materials, which when combined would make the best roads, and they called it cement. Then a few more of God's great men got together and selected other materials which had good wearing qualities, made a mixture of them with cement and so they had it. Nothing has been discovered since, that has or is its equal for buildings, bridges, docks, dams, or roads. It will outlast any and all other materials that have as yet been discovered, for any of the above purposes. It will not wear out, it will neither corrode nor waste away, and it will last for all time.

While I am writing this, I raise my eyes and look out on a perfect piece of Concrete Road laid eighteen years ago, and yet with this and other strips in our three cities and two strips of six or seven miles each in our county, we go on spending thousands and thousands of dollars every year building soft stuff roads without a single bit of wearing qualities in their mixture, and these fellows "have to have" a concrete foundation on which to put their soft black top stuff in order to hold it up. If they put it on the ground as the cement fellows do, heavy trucks would sink into it on a warm day, as our old wagons did in a muddy road.

Now I am getting down to earth again. By this I mean gravel. Gravel is all right if a wagon loaded with that stuff could go behind every car that goes over the road to repair the damage.

Then another discovery was made by some wise guy. He said to his pals. We'll put a lot of black oil or tar on the gravel. That will do away with the dust. Among this crowd of wise men I think there must have been an automobile man, for he said, that's fine. That surely will raise h——l with all the new cars. Put it on thick, for the more miles of road we put it on, and the thicker it is, the greater number of cars it will injure and spoil. And yet we have a lot of people who insist that these are the kind of roads to build, and the taxpayers and the automobile owners stand for it, which is something that no good business man would do.

Yours truly,
Uncle George H. Van Pelt.

OF INTEREST TO FARMERS
By B. C. Mellencamp

Michigan will be honored this year by being host to the National Dairy Show, which will be held at the State Fair Grounds, Detroit, October 6th to 13th. The dairy interests of Michigan have for many years cherished the hope that some time the National Dairy Show would be staged in this state. Breeders and dairymen will have an opportunity this fall to see the best animals of the five leading dairy breeds. This show for cattle is commonly called the "Court of Last Resort," because it is the one show at which prize winners of state fairs and sectional shows all over the United States and Canada are brought together to battle for the prize af prizes.

Plans are being made to conduct a Charlevoix county tour to the National Show and it is hoped that many of our dairymen can arrange their plans to join this tour and see the greatest sight you will ever see and find out the types you will want to work for. Until the 18th of September, you can purchase three tickets from County Agent Mellencamp for $1.00, saving 50c. Don't forget there will be educational exhibits, such as dairy machinery, forage crops and health food show. Also the woman's division will prove of interest to every farm woman. Begin now on your plans to attend. Let's have 15 or 20 carloads to go in one group. Parking space will be arranged for the tour. Take three or four days' time and bring the family and don't forget ta buy your tickets now, so we can plan on you.

Good Elimination Is Essential to Good Health.

THE kidneys are the blood filters. If they fail to function properly there is apt to be a retention of toxic poisons in the blood. A dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches, headaches, and dizziness are symptams af this condition. Further evidence af improper kidney function is aften found in burning or scanty passage of secretions. Each year more and more people are learning the value of Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, in this condition. Scarcely a nook or hamlet anywhere but has many enthusiastic users. Ask your neighbor!

Peaches for Canning

Many people have recently phoned us to ask if we were again having a carload of Canning Peaches this Fall. We have assured them that we WILL HAVE A CAR, and knowing many other of our customers of previous years will want the fruit again, we take this means of assuring everyone that we are getting a large carload—to be here late in September or early October, direct from orchard in New York State.

Crop is large this year—fruit will be excellent, and price will be low. Many reservations have already been made. Phone or write your order and we will reserve the number of baskets you want. We guarantee to satisfy you.

WEATHER VANE IS A FINE PIECE OF WORK

Represents a Sailing Vessel with Full Rigging

The weather vane mounted on the cupola of Logan Thomson's Boathouse Monday, was recently completed by Frank Novotny in Bonthron's tin shop.

It is a very fine piece of tin smithing and reflects due credit upon the maker. The vane represents a sailing vessel in full rig and is cut out of copper sheeting and mounted on pedestal with a large copper ball [illegible]he base. The piece of work has [illegible]ed much attention and was [illegible] in the plumbing shop win[illegible]ay evening and Sunday.

FOOTBALL SQUAD REPORTS FOR PRACTICE

First Game Here Sept. 25 with Boyne City Eleven

Charlevoix high school's football squad reported for practice this week under the leadership of Bayardl K. Buchen, coach. The boys are hard at work getting in shape for their first game, which will be played with Boyne City, at Charlevoix, Saturday, September 25th..

Coach Buchen has some very good material with which to round out a team this year, some experienced material and plenty of promising new material having reported for practice. Following is the schedule of games in line for the local squad:

Sept. 25—Boyne City at Charlevoix.
Oct. 1—East Jordan there.
Oct. 9—Traverse City here.
Oct. 15—Mancelona there.
Oct. 23—Harbor Springs here.
Oct. 30—Petoskey there.
Nov. 13—Cheboygan here.

All games will be called at 2:00 p. m.

NEW LANDING SLIPS NEARLY COMPLETED

Will Provide Landing Places for at Least Ten Yachts

Rapid progress is being made on the construction of the new docks being built on the city property at the foot of Antrim street.

Piling for the five docks has all been driven and planking on four of them is nearly completed. Landing places for at least ten yachts will be provided when the slips are finished. Work on the band stand and rest room is also nearly finished. It is our hope that the entire west side of Round Lake will be taken care of in the same manner in the near future.

SCHOOL WORK IS NOW WELL UNDER WAY

Student Body of Charlevoix High School Commences New Year With Enthusiasm

Supt. George Coverdale of the Charlevoix Public schools reports a large attendance of students in the high school and a full quota in the different grades. Close to two hundred have enrolled in the high school and well over four hundred in the grades, including the two ward schools.

The first week of school just closed, showed splendid enthusism among students and teachers alike, and with the present spirit continued the year will be one of the most successful in the history of the school. Several of the classes in the high school have elected officers and chosen class sponsors as follows.

Senior Class—
Pres., Willard Smith.
Vice Pres., Gwen Geneit.
Sec., Isabelle Hendrickson.
Trens., Francis Milner.
Class Sponsor, S. E. Colman.

Junior Class—
Pres., LaRue Higman.
Vice Pres., Fannybelle Siminow.
Treas., Ida Ingalls.
Class Sponsor, Leona McKinley.

Sophomore Class—
Pres., Dick Marshall.
Vice Pres., Velera Ripley.
Sec., Nellie Smith.
Trens., Myrtle O'Neil.
Class Sponsor, Miss Sarah Lamb.

The commercial department has developed into one of the most important offered by the school. Accounting, bookkeeping, shorthand, typewriting and other commercial subjects are offered and all classes are reported full. Other courses offered are equally as popular and teachers now have their groups well organized.

The interior of the school buildings were redecorated this summer and need minor repairs attended to. Prospects are bright for an unusually successful year.

COUNTIES CLOSED TO DEER HUNTING

For Five-Year Period Beginning November 15, 1926

With the approach of the deer hunting season we have had many inquiries as to the counties closed to deer hunters this season. Following is a list taken from the digest of game laws issued by the state department of conservation:

Unlawful to hunt or kill deer in the following counties for a period of five years beginning November 15, 1926: Allegan, Arenac, Barry, Bay, Berrien, Branch, Calhoun, Cass, Clare, Clinton, Charlevoix, Eaton, Emmet, Genesee, Gladwin, Gratiot, Hillsdale, Huron, Ingham, Ionia, Isabella, Jackson, Kalamazoo, Kent, Lake, Lapeer, Lenawee, Livingston, Macomb, Mason, Mecosta, Midland, Monroe, Montcalm, Muskegon, Newaygo, Oakland, Oceana, Osceola, Ottawa, Saginaw, Sanilac, Shiawassee, St. Clair, St. Joseph, Tuscola, VanBuren, Washtena, and Wayne.

Pomona delegates will be selected to attend the State Grange at East Lansing. It is hoped that every grange will be well represented.

FRANK P. BOHN EXPRESSES HIS APPRECIATION

To the Voters of Charlevoix County:

I am indeed grateful to all the voters of the county for the support accorded me in my candidacy for the nomination for congressman from the Eleventh District of Michigan, and appreciate all that was done by the many disinterested friends in my behalf. I hope that I may continue to merit your confidence, and extend to all my sincere thanks for your favors and support.

Sincerely yours,
Frank P. Bohn.

BEAUTIFUL BUNGALOW UNDER CONSTRUCTION

Haynes City People Enthusiastic Over Beauties of Boulder Park

The latest addition to Boulder Park is the stone bungalow now under construction on one of the front row lots for Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Hutchinson of Haynes City, Florida.

The unusual form of construction used on the cottage will make it one of the most beautiful in the city. It is being constructed of split boulders, lined with cobble stone, trimmed with black mortar. It is estimated the seven-room house will cost in the neighborhood of $10,000 when completed. Thomas Russell has the contract for the mason work and W. E. Parmelee the carpenter work.

This is the fifth cottage to be built since last season. Three are completed and two are now under construction. Excavating has been completed and construction will soon start on a cottage for Frank E. Williams of St. Louis, Mo., who is an attorney for the Pennsylvanin railroad. This will make the sixth and the seventh will also be commenced before winter sets in.

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN IN VIEW

KEEP ADVANTAGES OF WEST MICHIGAN BEFORE PUBLIC

Real Estate Men Held Enthusiastic Meeting Last Friday—Want Aid of Business Men

Over sixty business men from the three counties of Antrim, Charlevoix and Emmet met at the Hotel Charlevoix at a banquet last Friday to organize for the resort development of the Michigan west shore region. Among the guests at the banquet besides representative Traverse City real estate men, were Glenn M. Porter and J. J. Fagan of Muskegon, both prominent in the real estate development business. The two latter addressed the meeting.

The main definite object was to promote subscriptions from business men throughout the three counties to pay the salary and expenses of a good publicity man whose business it would be to keep the resort advantages of Western Michigan constantly before the public in the form of newspaper stories and feature articles. Many people of national prominence come here to play each year; and it is certain that their vacation activities are as interesting to the public as their business accomplishments. It is proposed to make the most of such news, for the good of the region.

Local business men have expressed much enthusiasm over the matter, and report that the meeting was a decided success. This was one of several similar ones that have been held at other points; and the last one, Thursday evening of this week will be held at The Chamber of Commerce, Grand Rapids. Many business men from this section plan to attend.

ATWOOD LAD ACCIDENTALLY WOUNDED

Shot by .22 Rifle in Hands of His Twin Brother, William

Harold DeYoung, aged 9 years, son of Mr. and Mrs. Bert DeYoung of Atwood, was brought to the Charlevoix Hospital last Saturday, suffering from a rifle wound in the stomach.

The young lad and his twin brother, William, had left the house to shoot crows with a .22 rifle. It is understood they stopped in the barn on their way and started shooting sparrows. Harold had climbed upon a beam in the barn when William picked up the rifle, pointed it at his brother and told him to sit still and see if he could hit him, with the result that he was shot through the stomach. William claimed he did not know the gun was loaded.

Physicians were unsuccessful in their attempt to remove the bullet, but the lad's condition is improving rapidly and he will soon be sent to his home.

Green Pledges Self to Keep Voters' Faith

Fred W. Green, successful Republican candidate for governor, at his Ionia home issued the following statement to the voters of the state:

"I am proud and happy to find myself the winner in such a spirited contest. It is even more gratifying to have the satisfaction of knowing that I made a clean fight and never descended to personalities. I did not hesitate at any time to give the governor credit for his achievements, even though I disagreed with the manner in which many of them were brought about.

"The issues were put publicly before the people; and the impressive majority given to my side of the controversy would seem like a plain mandate to advocate to the legislature the restoration to our government of the checks and balances which are so necessary to maintain independently the executive, legislative and judicial departments.

No Ill Feeling

"I chose to make my fight inside the Republican party, and as its standard bearer I shall strive to accomplish this legislation which has been demanded by the people. Out of this campaign there has not come to me ill feeling toward any man. I admire the man who fights hard, if he also fights fair. Many abuses of the primary have been developed by this campaign which should have the attention of all those who are interested in good government. I shall try to heal the wounds that have been made by the primary battle to the end that our party may present a united front this fall. The Republican party must not stand still and be content with its past achievements. There are many evils to be corrected and there are progressive measures looking to the betterment of conditions in Michigan that should be advocated.

Thanks Friends

"Whatever the outcome of the election, nothing can take from me the memory of the loyal, unselfish service given me by the home folks in Ionia county and my many friends throughout the state. I shall strive always to merit their approval and hold the great hope that if I am called to the governorship they may continue my loyal friends to the end."

OLD MAN JINX VISITED COUNTY FAIR

Board of Fair Directors Made Fine Showing Despite Conditions

The Charlevoix county fair, held at East Jordan last Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, was, in some respects far from the success of last year.

Exhibits in all departments were up to the average and in some cases the best ever shown. The fine display of all farm produce and in the dairy department showed more than average interest on the part of farmers throughout the county.

The main disappointment to the board of directors of the fair came in the cancellation at the last moment of the fine program of free acts. The fireworks display which was to have been shown on Thursday evening, was cancelled Wednesday evening, even too late to let the fact be known to the public. Rain ruined the race track making horse races almost impossible. Under these conditions the board of directors did all in their power to make the fair a success, and are now making plans to make next year's fair the best on record.

RED CROSS APPEALS FOR CONTRIBUTIONS

Will Give Aid to Injured and Homeless in Florida

Mrs. J. M. Harris of Boyne City, county chairman of the American Red Cross, received the following telegram and has asked the Courier to give it full publicity:

"St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 19—Red Cross mobilizing all resources for relief of disaster sufferers in Florida hurricane. Your chapter should give immediate publicity, calling attention to the great loss of life, large number injured and homeless. Announce readiness to forward contributions. This word should go to entire jurisdiction of your chapter. Remit sums received daily."

The urgent need of immediate relief to these suffering people is imperative. Some dear friend or relative may be without the necessities of life. You can aid in no more just cause nor under more urgent circumstances. The Charlevoix County Bank will take care of all local contributions. Get in touch with them and do what you can.

COCHRUN QUITS AS GROESBECK LOSES

Conservation Secretary Says He Will Switch to Comstock

Edgar R. Cochrun, secretary of state conservation commission, has submitted his resignation to William H. Wallace, Saginaw, chairman of the commission.

Cochrun's resignation comes as an aftermath of the primary election. He was a member of the speaking staff of Gov. Alex J. Groesbeck, defeated candidate, and a militant supporter of the governor. Cochrun announced that he would support William A. Comstock, Democratic candidate for governor, rather than back F. W. Green, Republican nominee.

John Baird, director of conservation, declared that this attitude of disloyalty to the Republican party was ground for requesting Cochrun's resignation.

Baird was also a strong supporter of Gov. Groesbeck in the primary fight. Green promised supporters he would fire Baird as soon as elevated to governor. Baird said Green would never get the chance, preferring to resign if Groesbeck suffered defeat.

IN BUSINESS HERE 35 YEARS

CHARLEVOIX LOSES PIONEER BUSINESS WOMAN

Mrs. Sarah Emrey Dies in Battle Creek Sanitarium After Over Two Years' Illness

Mrs. Sarah Emrey, a resident of Charlevoix for over 35 years, died at the Battle Creek Sanitarium, Friday, September 17, after an illness covering a period of over two years, caused by throat trouble. During the past year she had sought relief in various hospitals and from leading throat specialists, but to no avail. Accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Thomas LaLonde, she left Charlevoix for Battle Creek Sanitarium on Monday prior to her death on Friday. She was conscious almost to the time of death and received the most devoted care and attention.

Sarah Bradley was born in York, Ontario, February 2nd, 1862, thus being 64 years of age. She came to Charlevoix 35 years ago last October, entering the mercantile business, which she continued up to the time of death. The Emrey Clothing Store was one of the oldest established business houses in Charlevoix, and was known throughout northern Michigan.

She is survived by two sisters, Mrs. Margaret Purdy of Los Angeles, California, and Mrs. J. R. McMullen of Calgary, Alberta, and one daughter, Mrs. Thomas LaLonde of Detroit, who was with her through her last illness.

Mrs. Emrey was a member of the local Congregational church, joining shortly after her arrival in Charlevoix. She was an earnest worker for any just cause, her sympathy was warm and true and she never failed to extend a helping hand to all who came to her in their hour of trouble.

The remains were brought to Charlevoix from Battle Creek, arriving here Saturday morning, and were taken to the home of her life-long friend, Mrs. Louise Elston on West Dixon avenue, from which place funeral services were held Tuesday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock, Rev. Bernard G. Mattson, officiating. Interment in Brookside cemetery.

All Charlevoix business houses closed during the hour of services and burial, thus showing their respect to a departed business associate of long years' standing.

FAREWELL PARTY FOR MRS. RABY TUESDAY

W. R. C. Members Honored Departing Friend

A very pleasant evening was spent at the home of Mrs. J. B. Lancaster last Tuesday evening by members of the Dena Scroggie W. R. C.

The occasion was a farewell party in honor of Mrs. Hazel Raby who left Sunday evening for Canada. Refreshments were served and the guest of honor received a pretty remembrance from her many friends.

HUNTING SEASON NOW OPEN

LAWFUL TO KILL DUCK AND MANY WATERFOWL

Synopsis of Michigan Game Laws and Information of Interest to Hunters

The open season for shooting wild duck and numerous other water fowl started Thursday morning, September 16. Many local hunters were on the lakes and a few ducks were bagged. The only birds killed were a few termed as "local," it being too early for the general big fall flight.

We are publishing below the open season and various laws relative to game, animals and birds.

The season on ducks opened September 16, and closes December 31. Fifteen may be bagged in one day 30 in possession at any one time and 50 in one calendar week. May be hunted from sunrise to sunset and it is unlawful to have in possession more than 10 days after the season closes.

The season on Wilson and jack snipe opens September 16 and closes December 31. Fifteen may be bagged in one day, 25 in possession at one time, and only 25 in one season. The season on geese and brant is the same time and only five may be killed in one day, eight in possession at any one time and 15 during the season. The same time also is good for black bellied and golden plover and yellow legs. Fifteen in one day, 15 in possession at any one time and 20 in season. Same season for rails, coots and gallinules, 25 in one day and 25 for the season.

Unlawful to kill spruce hens until 1930. Quail is unlawful to hunt or kill at any time, also homing pigeons and mourning doves.

The season on Chinese ring-necked pheasant opens October 25 and closes October 31. The bag limits are two males in one day, four males in possession and four males in season. Partridge (ruffed grouse) season is on at the same time and bag limits are five in one day, 10 in possession and 20 in season. The same season applies for Prairie chicken with bag limits of five in one day, 10 in possession and 25 in season.

The wood cock season opens October 25 and closes October 31 with five in one day, 10 in possession and 20 in season.

Season on rabbits opens October 25 and closes on January 31, and on snow-shoe, commonly called jack rabbits, October 25 to February 15, 7 in done day and 10 at one time. Black and gray squirrel are unlawful to kill until October 25, 1927. The fox squirrel season opens October 25 and closes October 30, five in one day and 15 in season.

The deer season opens on November 15 and closes November 30. There is a closed season on beaver, otter, fisher and marten until 1930. Mu-krat and mink may be hunted from February 1 to March 31. Raccoon from October 15 to December 31. Bear from November 15 to 30. Coyote, wolf, lynx, wildcat, weasels, owls, woodchucks, crows and certain kinds of hawks may be hunted at any time.

All persons over seventeen years of age must secure from the Department of Conservation, county clerk or conservation officer, a license to hunt and trap any birds or animals found in this state.

Automobiles, power boats and aircraft. Hunting partridge or water fowl from automobiles, power boats or aircraft prohibited. Unlawful to have loaded firearms in automobile. This applies to both magazine and barrels.

Clare county, Franklin township. Unlawful to hunt for a period of five years from first day of April, 1926.

CHARLEVOIX FOLKS REPORTED SAFE AT SARASOTA

A telegram from Miss Helen Mason to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Mason, states as follows:

"Storm bad but we are fine. Don't worry. Helen."

Miss Helen left Charlevoix about two weeks ago for Sarasota, and is now a teacher in the public schools there. Her telegram somewhat relieves the anxiety over the welfare of a former Charlevoix residents now living in Sarasota. No other information as to damage from the storm at this point was mentioned in the telegram.

Stomach So Bad Can't Eat Even Fruit

"For years was badly constipated and troubled with gas after eating. Could not eat fruit and many other things. Adlerika has done me good—can now eat anything." (signed) W. H. Fletcher. Adlerika removes GAS and often brings astonishing relief to the stomach. Brings out a surprising amount of old waste matter you never thought was in the system. Stops that full bloated feeling and makes you enjoy eating. Excellent for chronic constipation. B. A. Herman, Druggist.

AT THE MOVIES

Zane Grey Film Coming to Palace

A Zane Grey story picturized by Paramount with absolute fidelity and authenticity, with one of the most notable stellar and supporting casts in screen history and acclaimed by reviewers as one of the most entertaining and thrilling Grey stories to date, comes to the Palace Theatre for an engagement of two days Saturday and Sunday.

"Desert Gold," concerns itself chiefly with the lawless days at the close of the last century, along the southwestern border. Into this seething whirlpool comes the son of a rich man and there he encounters a girl. With her he escapes from baddits into the Painted Desert and amid wild rides, fights and adventure, finds love and gold.

Critics Acclaim Big Kane Picture

Although a comedy, "Bluebeard's Seven Wives," which comes Monday and Tuesday to the Palace Theatre, contains a picturization of the famous "balcony" scene from "Romeo and Juliet." Critics who have previewed the film claim that it is the most artistic presentation of the bard ever done on the screen.

"Paradise" Coming Here Next Week

Everything that goes to make an "audience picture" will be found in First National's latest Milton Sills starring photoplay, "Paradise" which comes to the Palace Theatre Wednesday and Thursday with a cast composed of Sills, Betty Bronson, Noah Beery, Kate Price, Charlie Murray, Lloyd Whitlock, Claude King and Ashley Cooper.

"A Social Celebrity" Stars Adolphe Menjou

Say what you will, Adolphe Menjou in his latest Parnmount, "A Social Celebrity," which arrives at the Palace Theatre on Fridny, has a mighty fine supporting cast.

CHAPTER I—Continued

"Get out, you old rip!" said Kent.

"Eat! Eat!" insisted the squaw, a certain ferocity in her manner.

"Did you walk clear in from the reservation?" asked Lydia.

The squaw nodded, and held out her scrawny hand for the children's inspection. "No eats, all time no eats! You give eats—poor old woman."

"Oh, Kent, she's half starved! Let's give her some of our lunch," exclaimed Lydia.

"Not on your life," returned Kent. "Dirty, lazy lot! Why don't they work?"

"If we'd go halves, we'd have enough," insisted Lydia.

"You told me you'd only enough for yourself. Get out of here, you old she-devil."

The squaw did not so much as glance at Kent. Her eyes were fastened on Lydia, with the look of a hungry, expectant dog. Lydia ran her fingers through her damp curls, and sighed. Then she gave little Patience her share of the bread and butter and a cooky. She laid the precious deviled egg in its twist of paper on top of the remainder of the bread and cookies and handed them to the Indian.

"You can't have any of mine, if you give yours up!" warned Kent.

"I don't want any, pig!" returned Lydia.

The old squaw received the food with trembling fingers and broke into sobs, that tore at her old throat painfully. She said something to Lydia in Indian, and then, to the children's surprise, she bundled the food up in her skirt and started as rapidly as possible back in the direction whence she had come.

"She's taking it back to some one," said Kent.

"Poor thing," said Lydia.

"Poor thing!" sniffed Kent. "It would be a good thing if they were all dead. My father says so."

"Well, I guess your father don't know everything," snapped Lydia.

"Evvyfing," said Patience, who had finished her lunch and was digging in the sand.

Kent paused in the beginning of his attack on his last sandwich to look Lydia over. She was as thin as a half-grown chicken in her wet bathing suit. Her damp curls, clinging to her head and her eyes a little heavy with heat and weariness after her morning of play, made her look scarcely older than Patience. Kent wouldn't confess, even to himself, how fond he was of Lydia.

"Here," he said gruffly. "I can't eat this sandwich. Mother made me too many. And here's a doughnut."

"Thanks, Kent," said Lydia meekly. She held Patience's abbreviated bathing suit skirt with one hand. "Where are you heading for, baby?" she asked.

"Mardy! Mardy!" screamed Patience, tugging at her leash.

"Oh, rats, it's Margery Marshall. Look at the duds on her. She makes me sick," groaned Kent.

"She's crazy about little Patience," answered Lydia, "so I put up with a lot from her."

She loosed her hold on Patience. The baby trundled along the sand to meet the little girl in an immaculate white sailor suit, who approached pushing a doll buggy large enough to hold Patience. She ran to meet the baby and kissed her, then allowed her to help push the doll carriage.

"Mardy fum! Mardy fum!" chanted Patience.

Margery's black hair was in a long braid, tied with a wide white ribbon. Margery's hands were clean and so were her white stockings and shoes. She brought the doll's carriage to pause before Lydia and Kent and gazed at them appraisingly out of bright black eyes—beautiful eyes large and heavily lashed. Kent's face was dirty and sweat streaked. His red bathing suit was gray with sand and green with grass stain. On his head he wore his favorite headgear, a disreputable white cotton cap with the words "Goldenrod Flour Mills" across the front.

"Well," he said belligerently, to Margery, "do you see anything green?"

Margery shrugged her shoulders. "Watcha playing?"

"Nothing! Want to play it?" replied Lydia.

"Thanks," answered Margery. "I'll watch you two while I sit with the baby. Isn't she just ducky in that bathing suit?"

Lydia melted visibly and showed a flash of white teeth. "You bet! How's Gwendolyn?" nodding toward the great bisque doll seated in the wonderful doll carriage. "I wish I had a doll like that!"

"Thanks, Kent," Said Lydia Meekly.

"She isn't in it with Florence Domhey," said Kent. "Florence is some old sport, she is. Guess I'd better cut her down."

During the game of pirates, Florence Domhey had been hung from a willow branch, in lieu of a yardarm, and had remained dangling there in the wind, forgotten by her mother.

Kent placed her in Patience's carriage. "I'll tell you what I'll do," he said. "I'll go up the shore and get Smith's flatboat. We'll anchor it out from the shore, and that'll be the wreck. We'll swim out to her and bring stuff in. And up under the bank there we'll build the cave and the barricade."

"Gee," exclaimed Lydia, "that's the best we've thought of yet. I'll be collecting stuff to put in the wreck."

All during the golden August afternoon the game waxed joyfully. For a long time, Margery sat aloof, playing with the baby. But when the excavating of the cave began, she succumbed and began to grovel in the sand with the other two. Constant small avalanches of sand and soil from the bank powdered the children's hair and clothes with gray-black dust.

"Gosh, this is too much like work," groaned Kent, at last. "I'll tell you, let's play the finding of Friday's father."

"I don't want to be tied up in a boat," protested Margery, at once.

"Mardy not in boat," chorused little Patience, toddling to the water's edge and throwing in a handful of sand.

"Isn't she in love!" sighed Margery.

"Huh, you girls make me sick," snorted Kent. "We won't tie you in the boat. We'll bring the boat in and get you, then we'll anchor it out where it is now, and—and—I'll go get Smith's rowboat, and Friday and I'll come out and rescue you."

Margery hesitated. "Aw, come on!" urged Kent. "Don't be such a 'fraid cat. That's why us kids don't like you, you're such a silly, dressed-up doll."

The banker's daughter flushed. Though she loved the pretty clothes and though the sense of superiority to other children, carefully cultivated by her mother, was the very breath of her nostrils, she had never been quite so happy as this afternoon when grubbing on an equality with these three inferior children.

"I'm not afraid at all and I'm just as dirty as Lydia is. Go ahead with your boat."

They tethered Patience with Kent's cord to one of the willow trees and Margery was paddled out several boat lengths from the shore and the great stone that served for anchor was dropped over. Kent took a clean dive overboard, swam ashore and disappeared along the willow path. Little Patience set up a wail.

"Baby tum too. Baby tum, too," she went.

"I'll go stay with her till Kent comes," said Lydia, diving into the water as casually as if she were rising from a chair.

"I won't stay in this awful boat alone!" shrieked Margery.

Lydia swam steadily to the shore, then turned. Margery was standing up in the boat.

"Sit down! Sit down!" cried Lydia.

Margery, beside herself with fear, tossed her arms. "I won't stay in this old—"

There was a great splash and a choking cry as Margery's black braid disappeared beneath the water.

"And she can't swim," gasped Lydia. "Kent!" she screamed, and made a flying leap into the water. Her slender, childish arms seemed suddenly steel. Her thin little legs took a racing stroke like tiny propellers. Margery came up on the far side of the boat and uttered another choking cry before she went down again. Lydia dived, caught the long black braid and brought the frenzied little face to the surface. Margery immediately threw an arm around Lydia's neck, and Lydia hit her in the face with a clenched small fist and all the strength she could muster.

"Let go, or I'll let you drown. Turn over on your back. There isn't a thing to be afraid of."

Margery, with a sob, obeyed and Lydia towed her the short distance to the boat. "There, catch hold," she said.

Both the children clung to the gunwale, Margery choking and sobbing.

"I can't lift you into the boat," panted Lydia. "But quit your crying. You're safe. There's Kent."

Kent had heard the call and some note of need in it registered, after a moment, in his mind. He ran back and leaped into the water.

He clambered into the boat and reaching over pulled Margery bodily over the gunwale. The child, sick and hysterical, huddled into the bottom of the boat.

"Are you all right, Lyd?" he asked.

"Sure," replied Lydia, who was beginning to recover her breath.

It was the work of a minute to get aboard the boat. Then unheeding little Patience's lamentations, the two children looked at each other and at Margery.

"I'll run for her mother," said Kent.

"And scare her to death! She isn't hurt a bit," insisted Lydia. "Margery, stop crying. You're all right, I tell you."

"I'll tell you," said Kent, "let's put her in Patience's carriage, and carry her home. The water she swallowed makes her awful sick at her stomach, I guess."

The fright over, the old spirit of adventure, with an added sense of Excess Uric Acid Gives Rise to Many Unpleasant Troubles.

AUTHORITIES agree that an excess of uric acid is primarily due to faulty kidney action. Retention of this toxic material often makes its presence felt by sore, painful joints, a tired, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backache and headache. That the kidneys are not functioning right is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Thousands assist their kidneys at such times by the use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Doan's are recommended by many local people. Ask your neighbor!

P. M. WILL OFFER LOW RATE TICKETS

To Chicago, Detroit, Toledo and Intermediate Points

The Pere Marquette railroad has announced another $10 sound trip excursion the same as last fall. Charlevoix people will have an opportunity to visit their friends and relatives in southern Michigan, Toledo and Chicago at greatly reduced rates.

The special excursion train will run south from Petoskey, leaving Chnrlevoix Tuesday morning, October 5th. Tickets for Detroit, Toledo and Chicago, will be good for 15 days, with stop-over privileges being allowed at intermediate points beyond Grand Rapids at which special train stops, such as Lansing, Howell, Holland, Benton Harbor, St. Joe, Michigan City, etc.

Last year the excursion was heavily patronized from Charlevoix and surrounding districts, people making the trip south for visits for the first time in years. Those intending to take advantage of the excursion make reservations as early as possible so thnt railroad officials may know how much equipment to provide.

VACATION PERIOD ENDS WITH DEATH

Joe Belisle Stricken While on His Way Home

According to a telegram received by Mrs. L. B. Bartlett, Joe Belisle, of Oak Park, Illinois, dropped dead at Grnnd Haven last Thursday while on his way home from his vacation period spent in Charlevoix.

The Belisle's had just finished their 28th annual vacation at The Bartlett. They left Charlevoix last Wednesday by auto at 10:00 a. m., driving through to Grand Haven, where they expected to cross the lake by boat. According to the telegram they were nboard the boat when Mr. Belisle was suddenly stricken, his death taking place at almost the same hour he left Charlevoix the previous day.

During the years they have spent in Charlevoix, Mr. and Mrs. Belisle had made many intimate friends, who greatly regret his sudden departure.

Hitching posts have lost much of their former usefulness, but anyway they serve for the street loafers to lean up against.

Attention Radio Fans

Most of you have been anxiously waiting for the time when you can pay some attention to your Radio Sets.

In less than a month Radio programs from all stations will be available to all good Receiving Sets. Our experience of last fall and winter has proven the superiority of the Bremmer-Tulley Sets to all others sold in Charlevoix. We are adding to our lines the famous Bush & Lane line, which will probably prove equal if not superior to the Bremmer-Tulloys.

We will continue to carry the Pfanstheil and Chelsea lines which are as good as most sets made, but at a lower price than the more powerful ones. Come in and let us demonstrate and explain the qualities of these sets.

OF INTEREST TO FARMERS
By B. C. Mellencamp

Plans have been completed to hold two Poultry Schools on September 29th, at which time Mr. Davidson will discuss nll poultry problems fully, especially culling, feeding and management.

The first meeting will begin at 9:30 fast time, Wednesday morning, nt the ranch of Arthur Guild, three miles south of Charlevoix and will continue the rest of the forenoon. This meeting is arranged so as to be convenient for poultry people to attend from the western portion of the county.

The second meeting will begin at 1:30 fast time in the afternoon of the same day at the farm of Edward Hunt, second farm enst of Deer Lake school house for the eastern section.

This will be your last opportunity to receive instruction in poultry, as only this one day could be given to Charlevoix county for poultry work and everyone interested in poultry is cordially invited to attend and learn all the latest in poultry management.

Mr. Wheeler, seed potato inspector from M. S. C., recently visited all the certified fields in the county and reports that they all passed the requirments in a very gratifying manner.

This year very little disease was found, indicating that the past year's work in hill selecting seed and destroying diseased hills, has raised the quality of seed to n very high degree and as a result very little rogeing was necessary in comparison with former years.

During the past five years averages show that certified seed has far outyielded table stock and has brought over 50 per cent more money, being sold almost entirely for seed purposes in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey and other states.

This year the yield will run, no doubt from present forecasts, 200 bushels per acre and price will be considernbly over the 5-year avernge.

The following are the fortunate seed potato men in this county:

Terry Barber, Boyne City, 4½ acres Russets and one-half acre Irish Cobbler.

Edd Jensen, Walloon Lake, 8 acres Rurnl Russet.

H. C. Stephens, Boyne City, 5 acres Rural Russet.

Chas. Koteskey, Boyne City, 4 acres Rural Russet.

Harry Behling, Boyne City, 3½ acres Rural Russets.

Zell Bricker, East Jordan, 3 acres Rural Russets.

W. K. Straw, Charlevoix, 3 acres Rural Russets.

heroism, animated Kent and Lydia.

Margery was tensed out of the boat and assisted into the perambulator, with her dripping white legs dangling helplessly over the end. Little Patience's tears were assuaged when she was placed in the doll buggy, with Margery's doll in her arms. Florence Dombey was tied papoose fashion to Lydia's back. The bicycle was hidden in the cave and with Kent wheeling Margery and Lydia, Patience, the procession started wildly for home.

By the time they had turned into the home street, Margery was beginning to recover, but she was still shivering and inclined to sob. Other children followed them and it was quite an imposing group that turned in at the Marshall gate, just as Mrs. Marshall came to the door to bid a guest good-by.

The scene that followed was difficult for either Lydia or Kent to describe afterward. There was a hullabaloo that brought half the mothers of the neighborhood into the yard. The doctor was sent for. Margery was put to bed and Kent and Lydia were mentioned as murderers, low-down brats and coarse little brutes by Mrs. Marshall, who ended by threatening them with the police.

Old Lizzie appeared on the scene in time to take Lydia's part and Kent disappeared after Mrs. Marshall had told him that Margery's father would be around to see his father that evening.

"Is the child dead?" demanded old Lizzie, holding Patience on one arm while Lydia clung to the other.

"She was able to walk upstairs," said a neighbor. "It's just Mrs. Marshall's way, you know."

"I'll way her," snorted Lizzie. "Fine thanks to Lydia for saving the child. Come home with your old Liz, dearie, and get into the nice clean dress I've got for you."

Lydia told the story to Amos at suppertime. He was much disturbed.

"I've told you often and often, Lydia, never to endanger a child that can't swim. You and Kent should have had more sense."

The quick tears sprang to the child's eyes. She was still much shaken.

"Is this lesson enough for you, or must I forbid your playing in the water? I thought I could trust you absolutely."

"Stop your scolding her, Amos Dudley," exclaimed old Lizzie. "I won't have it. She's too nervous a child."

Amos was saved a reply by a ring at the doorbell. Lizzie let Margery's father in. He was a short, red-faced man with black hair and eyes. He was too much excited now to stand on ceremony, and he followed Lizzie into the dining-room.

"This won't do, Dudley. These wild young ones of yours—"

"Wait a minute, Marshall," interrupted Amos, with a dignity that he had brought with him from New England. "Margery is all right, so we can go over this thing calmly. Sit down and listen to Lydia's story. Tell him, Lydia."

Lydia left her place and crowded up against her father's side. Old Lizzie was holding the baby.

"It was like this," Lydia began. "Baby and me were going to play by ourselves under the willows. Then Kent, he came and he played pirates with us. And then, right after we'd had our lunch, Margery she came along and Kent and I were mad—"

The child paused uncomfortably and rubbed her curly yellow head with her thin little hand in an embarrassed way.

"Why were you mad, Lydia?" In spite of himself, Marshall's voice was softening, as Amos had known it would. Lydia made a deep appeal somehow to the tenderness of men.

"Tell Mr. Marshall all you told me, Lydia," said Amos.

"Well—well, you see, it's like this. Margery's always so clean and she has lovely clothes and—and she—she looks down on us other kids so we won't generally let her play with us—and she's an awful 'fraid cat and—and a tattle-tale. But when we got to playing Robinson Crusoe, and were digging the cave she helped and got terrible dirty, just like us, and then she wanted to be Friday's father, and then—well—now—I guess the rest of it was Kent's and my fault. We forgot she couldn't swim and we forgot what a cry-baby she was. 'Cause you see, water's almost like land to Kent and me and we'd been swimmin' most all day, and Margery's the only kid around here that can't swim."

"Why can't she swim?" demanded Marshall. "How'd all the rest of you learn? Don't you think you were mean not to let her learn?"

Again Lydia's pellucid eyes widened. "If her mother won't let her play with common kids like us! And us kids never learned. We've just played on the water ever since we was as big as baby."

David Marshall scowled and stirred uncomfortably. He did not look at Amos, who sat with his arm about Lydia, his tan face a lesser replica of the old engraving of Daniel Webster hanging on the wall above.

"Well, go on! How'd she come to fall overboard?"

"She and I was sitting in the boat, and baby, she was tied to a tree by a long string and she began to cry to come, too, and I jumped over to go quiet her. Kent he'd gone to get another boat. And Margery she jumped up and began to yell and wave her arms and fell overboard. Then I remembered she couldn't swim and I went back and got her and Kent came and pulled us in shore. It wasn't anything, but Margery's such a cry-baby. Lizzie, she's terrible uncomfortable."

Lydia's attention had returned to little Patience. "I'll take her up to bed," she said, "it won't take but a few minutes."

"I'll carry her," said Lizzie.

The baby opened her eyes. "No, no one cally but Lyd."

"Let daddy carry you," begged Amos.

BEST YEAR IN ITS HISTORY

$65,000 SUBSCRIBED TO ADVERTISE WESTERN MICHIGAN

Grand Rapids Clearing House Heads List of Contributors with $6,000

Final reports, reaching Hugh J. Gray, secretary-manager of the Michigan Tourist and Resort Association, previous to the annual meeting of the organization that will be held at Manistee October 5 and 6, indicate that from a financial standpoint this has been the most successful year in the history of the association. The total amount of money received from all sources will exceed $65,000.

More than usual interest attaches itself to the number of large subscriptions received this year from individuals, business institutions, chambers of commerce and county supervisors. In this respect the association has had no year equal to the present. This is an indication that the larger business interests have been awakened to the great possibilities of Western Michigan as a summer region and are willing to back its development as such with their money. Heading the list of large subscribers is the Grand Rapids Clearing House association, with $6,000. The total amount of money received through subscriptions of $1,000, or more, is $29,000, distributed as follows:

Manistee Board of Commerce, $2,000 A. H. Landwehr, Holland, $1,000; John G. Emery, Grand Rapids, $1,000; Grand Rapids Clearing House association, $6,000; Grand Rapids Press, $1,000; Charles M. Heald, Grand Rapids, $1,000; Herpolsheimer company, $1,000; Platte & Radcliffe, Grand Rapids, $1,000; Kinsey & Buys, Grand Rapids, $1,000; Occidental Hotel, Muskegon, (through Chamber of Commerce) $1,000; Goodrich Transit company, $1,000; Pennsylvania Railroad company, $2,000; Petoskey Chamber of Commerce, $1,000; Ludington Trade Bureau, $1,000; Muskegon Chamber of Commerce, $3,000; Board of Supervisors, Muskegon county, $2,000; Kent county, $1,000; Ottawa county, $1,000, and Berrien county, $1,000.

The amount of money subscribed in Kent county and Grand Rapids was the largest of any year in the past. With a few more subscribers to hear from the total will exceed $25,000. Muskegon county likewise exceeded its past performances.

Owing to a late and unfavorable season, many resorts were unable to subscribe in proportion to the subscriptions of the more indirect beneficiaries of the tourist business. A large part of the funds obtained came from persons and interests who derive no direct benefit from the tourist business. On the theory, however, that anything that benefits Western Michigan is for the ultimate good of all, the Michigan Tourist and Resort association, this year, received most of its support from the far-sighted, forward-looking people.

Had conditions been better for the resorts, the total money obtained would have exceeded $100,000. Some of the subscriptions this year have been made permanent and the association faces the future free of debt and an assured welcome wherever it can be of service.

ONLY PRIZE WINNERS COME TO DAIRY SHOW

Grade Cattle Receive Special Recognition at Exposition

Kings and Queens of dairy land, blue ribbon winners at state and sectional fairs throughout the United States and Canada, will compete at the "court of last resort" for the premier dairy honors of the world when the National Dairy Exposition opens at the Michigan State Fair grounds on October 6.

When entries closed on September 15, fifteen hundred of the world's leading dniry cattle, from twenty states, were registered. They comprise the greatest dairy "herd" ever assemhled, according to J. E. Burnett, superintendent of cattle exhibits.

Grade cattle classes are receiving considerable emphasis this year. Nearly $6,500 in premiums is given which compares very favorably with the pure bred cattle awards. All cows must be sired by pure bred bulls, and the sire's name and number given with the entry. Individual and group awards are made.

The National Dairy association encourages the development of grade herds because in n great many cnses the association realizes that the grade cow opens up the nvenue to profitable dairy production.

HOSPITAL NOTES

Edward Fielstra of Ellsworth, was discharged from the hospital last Saturday.

Harold DeYoung, son of Mr. nnd Mrs. Bert DeYoung of Atwood, entered the hospital last Saturday, suffering from n rifle wound in the stomach, fired by his brother while the lads were shooting sparrows in the barn on their farm. He is getting along nicely.

Mrs. Frank Novotny submitted to an operation last week and is improving rapidly.

Mrs. Ada Seeman of Central Lake, submitted to an operation Tuesday evening. Dr. Duffey of Central Lake, performed the operation.

Miss Carrie Joffery returned to the home of her parents here Monday, fully recovered from a goitre operation.

A new McKesson gas machine was installed nt the locnl hospital last week at a cost of $500. The new equipment provides the latest and most improved method of giving anesthetic. Miss Larson is now in a Detroit hospital taking a course in metabolism and ethelene gas in view of handling the new equipment.

The hospital board and nursing staff are very well pleased with a large gift of supplies and groceries donated by the Chicago Club at the close of the resort season.

DEAD AFTER PROLONGED ILLNESS

FRIENDS—MOURN DEATH OF THOMAS W. MILNER

Deceased Had Spent Forty Years of His Life in Employ of Three Lumbering Firms

For nearly two years this community has carried with unremitting sympathy their anxiety for the welfare of their townsman, neighbor and friend, Thomas W. Milner, but still experienced a real shock when the word was passed around that he had passed awny last Wednesday evening.

Mr. Milner was taken sick at Atlantn, Mich., where he was employed by the Kneeland Bigelow & Co. Lumber Co. He came home for a short period nf recuperation, and returned to his work when only partially recovered and fell an easy victim to thnt dread disease—pneumonia. He seemed to recover from this nilment, but it had so weakened other organs that, though he fought a valinnt fight for more than n yenr nnd a half the weary body refnsed to struggle longer nnd he passed to the great beyond. We pause on our journey hence to pay tribute to a kind and faithful husband, a loving, thoughtful father, a consistent church member, n faithful brother in the fraternities, and an intelligent and patriotic citizen. A man of whom neighbors had only kind words to speak. We will miss him greatly and mourn his departure but do not wish him back to continue in physical distress. We nre poorer and heaven is richer for his going.

Deceased was born nt Hndley, Pa., July 26, 1861, remained at his birth plnce until about twenty years of age when he came to Munistee nnd from there to Grayling, Mich., then to Lewiston, entering the employ of Nicholson and Hanson, a lumbering firm. He was in the employ of this firm about fourteen years. He moved from there to Gaylord where he was employed by Salling & Hnnson with whom he was employed nearly twenty yenrs, und then entered the employ of Kneeland Bigelow & Co. with whom he continued about twelve yenrs, thus spending more than forty years in the employ of three firms, whlch fact testifies to his dependability.

Mr. Milner was married at Lewiston, December 11, 1893, to Susan H. Reid. To this union four childreu were born. One son, Roy; three daughters, Florence, Margaret, and Frances, all of whom survive, and with whom the entire community shares the sorrow and loss.

While living at Gaylord, deceased was converted under the ministry of Rev. F. Dewey Ehle, and baptized into the Gaylord church, coming from there to the Charlevoix Baptist church by letter about twenty years ago. During these years he has served the church as deacon, trustee, and usher, and to the very last maintained a deep interest in its activities.

As a public servant he served as justice of the peace, three years, and five years as president of the school board at Lewiston. He also spent several months looking after interests in silver and gold mines in old Mexico. While living at Lewiston Mr. Milner was made an Odd Fellow and has always retained his membership in that lodge. While at Grayling he was made a Mason and transferred his membership to the Charlevoix lodge where he has served in various official capacities, and under which auspicies the mortal remains were buried.

The obsequies were held from the home on Clinton street, Monday, September 27, at 10:00 a. m. under Masonic direction, Rev. Herman Burns, D. D., of the Baptist church officiating.

REGIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL CONFERENCE

At Alpena, October 4-6; Cadillac, October 13-15

If interested in religious education and Sunday school work, Charlevoix people are invited to attend Michigan's great Region Sunday School conference, which will be held at Alpena, October 4-6, and at Cadillac, October 13-15.

Charlevoix people are invited to come and bring a load and stay through the three days. Register in advance and receive free breakfast and lodging. Registration blanks nmy be secured from Mrs. Harker Kirby, Charlevoix.

The same program and same speakers will be presented at all the conferences, and the latter are of national prominence. The enrollment fee is one dollar and Charlevoix is expected to send at least ten delegates.

COMMUNITY RECEPTION FOR TEACHERS

Planned for Friday Evening at Methodist Church

A community reception for all teachers of Charlevoix Public Schools will be held in the Methodist church on Friday evening, October 1. The term "community" means that everyone is cordially invited to attend the reception. Having no children in school, not being a taxpayer or not being a member of the Methodist church does not constitute an excuse for staying away. "Community" reception means everyone in the city who cares to attend.

The intent of the affair is intended to give all an opportunity to meet the teachers of OUR schools, and at the same time meet the teacher who spends from five to six hours daily with our youngsters. The result will be encouragement to the teachers and a better understanding between parent and teacher.

C. H. S. LOSES OPENING GAME

HEAVIER BOYNE OUTFIT ADD SECOND VICTORY OF SEASON

Locals Showed Good Form in Final Period—New Line-up for East Jordan Tilt

The local football squad lost their opening game of the season last Saturday afternoon to their old rivals, Boyne City, who went home with another victory ndded to their collection.

Boyne, who already have one game to their credit by defeating Gaylord last week, seemed to have a decided advantage over the inexperienced locals, although the game was closely fought until the final whistle.

Late in the first quarter, after working the ball to Charlevoix's seven-yard line, Kizer, Boyne's fullback, carried the ball over for the first touchdown. The second touchdown came early in the fourth quarter. Boyne had worked the ball to Charlevoix's two-yard line and were held there for downs. Charlevoix's kick on the first play from behind the lines was blocked, Boyne recovering the ball for their second counter. The final score was 14 to 0.

The locals showed a real brand of football during the fourth quarter and backed the heavier Boyne outfit repeatedly to their own goal line. Farmer and Gill were the outstanding stars for Charlevoix and Judson for Boyne.

Following is the line-up:

Boyne		Charlevox
Morgan	L.E.	Hammond
Rothenberger	L.T.	Williams
Speltz	L.G.	Smith
Judkins	C.	Gill
Gould	R.G.	Parmelee
Buschert (C)	R.T.	Farmer
Chase	R.E.	Cooper (C)
Happe	Q.	Marshall
Goodwin	L.H.	Brown
Erber	R.H.	Beaudoin
Kizer	F.	Higman

Coach (Tex) Buchen has an entirely new line-up for the East Jordan game, at East Jordan, Friday afternoon, October 1. Let's see what they can do.

S. S. CONVENTION WELL ATTENDED

NINETY-FIVE DELEGATES PRESENT FROM COUNTY.

Pastors and School Teachers Took Part in Interesting and Instructivo Program

The Charlevoix County Sunday School convention, held at Bay Shore on Tuesday afternoon and evening, wns a most enjoyable and profitable occasion. Ninety-five delegates and visitors were registered from Barnard, Bay Shore, Boyne City, Burgess, Charlevoix, Clarion, East Jordan, Ellsworth, and Ironton. Many were present at the evening session who did not enroll.

The Bay Shore people have one of the finest rural churches in the county. After their first house of worship burned a few years ago, the present building was moved piecemeal from Harbor Springs and rebuilt on a new site facing M-11. It is a worthy monument to the men and women of the community who desire for themselves and their children the better things of life.

The Sunday school superintendent, F. G. Worth, voiced the welcome of the local church and everything possible was done for the comfort of the visitors, especially at the close of the afternoon session, when everyone adjourned to the well equipped basement for a fellowship supper.

The convention voted to raise $150.00 next yenr in the county, this to be expended ns thought best by the executive committee. The hope was expressed that some really constructive work might be done in Charlevoix county.

The old officers were re-elected as follows:

President—Rev. E. P. Linnell, Boyne City.

Vice President—Mrs. B. Saltonstall, Charlevoix.

Secretary—Mrs. Harker Kirby.

Treasurer—W. H. Sloan, East Jordan.

The following topics were presented:

"The Community Teacher Training Class," by Rev. C. E. Pollock.

"The Need of the Gospel and More Adequate Religious Instruction," by Rev. J. B. Peatling.

"Why the Council of Religious Education," by Rev. B. G. Mattson.

"What Can the Public School Teacher Do for the Sunday School," A. K. Oakley and Walter Alexander.

"How to Eliminate the Cigaret," by A. J. Duncanson and Miss Caroline Geiken.

Rev. Herman Burns and Rev. C. M. Conklin conducted the devotional services. Mrs. A. J. Stelter had charge of the music and was assisted by Mrs. H. D. Dean and Mrs. B. G. Mattson.

Rev. C. W. Sidebotham of East Jordan delivered an inspiring address at the evening session.

The presence and assistance of so many pastors and public school teachers was an outstanding feature of the convention.

The executive committee was directed to plan for a meeting next June at Barnard.

BOHN MAKES REMARKABLE RUN

HOLDS THE SOLID VOTE OF UPPER PENINSULA.

Carries Every County Above Straits and Two Counties in Scott's Own Territory.

Carrying three lower peninsula counties and holding the upper peninsula solid, State Senator Frank P. Bohn defeated Congressman Frank D. Scott for the Republican nomination in the Eleventh District in Tuesday's battle of ballots, rolling up a majority of nearly 3,000 votes.

Bohn carried every county in the upper peninsula by substantial majorities, and invading the enemy's territory captured Otsego and Presque Isle counties.

His own home county cast an unprecedented heavy vote nnd paid him a wonderful compliment in starting him off on the road to victory with a majority of over 1100 votes. Luce county pulled 1446 ballots, the largest vote ever cast in the county and of this number Bohn received 1247; Scott 133.

The size of the Luce county vote is accounted for by the systematic effort which was made to get it out. Dozens of automobiles were pressed into service and the county scoured from one end to the other. A careful check was kept at the polls and there was always n car in waiting to bring in any missing voter. One voter traveled fifty miles from near the Chippewa county line to cast his vote for Bohn. Newberry's "go get 'em" spirit was rampant, the boys were out for a clean-up and they did a beautiful job.

Bohn assumed a lead when the first returns began to come in and his vote continued to grow as the evening progressed. Shortly after midnight a telegram was received from Scott's campaign manager conceding Bohn's election by two thousand majority and this was followed by a message from Congressman Scott congratulating his opponent, and in which he said, "I cannot defeat a man who carries ten out of the sixteen counties in the district. You have conducted a wonderfully clean and fair campaign and I am for you."

Dr. Bohn carried the district by a majority of almost 3000. The vote by counties with virtually every precinct reported is as follows:

	Scott	Bohn
Alpena	2612	892
Alger	947	1318
Antrim	1207	935
Charlevoix	1668	1621
Cheboygan	1866	925
Chippewa	2002	2515
Delta	2315	4741
Emmet	1742	1155
Kalkaska	590	316
Luce	133	1247
Mackinaw	368	683
Menominee	1669	2303
Montmorency	531	392
Otsego	407	780
Presque Isle	908	984
Schoolcraft	692	1559
Delta	2315	4741
Totals	16620	22522

Wednesday afternoon after the primary Newberry held a jollification meeting in celebration of the victory. Headed by a band a crowd of several hundred school children and citizens paraded the business section and afterward assembled at Senator Bohn's home. He made n brief and feeling address to the crowd in which he expressed his appreciation for their support throughout the campaign and the wonderful vote given him at the polls. He closed his remarks by expressing the wish that his elevation to the office of congressmnn make no difference in his reintions with the home folks nnd that he continue to be called just "Doc. Bohn."

He was given a round of cheers and when Congressman Scott's telegram was read, he also came in for a share in the cheering.—Newberry News.

CHARLEVOIX FOLKS ENJOY CANOE TRIP

Fourteen Miles of River Scenery Most Beautiful in North Mich.

A party of six people, including Mr. and Mrs. Joe Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hamlin and Mr. and Mrs. P. R. Ross made a canoe trip down the Jordan river last Sunday from Graves' Crossing to the lake.

A fine picnic dinner was an enjoyable feature of the trip and the party expressed their satisfaction of the wonderful river trip. Probably few local people realize the beauty of this canoe trip so near at hand. Many summer visitors make the trip annually and are loud in the praises of the beauties of Jordan river.

COURT TO TRY UNUSUAL CASE

COUPLE CHARGED WITH MUTILATING PUBLIC RECORDS

First Case of This Nature Ever Brought Before Local Court. Will Be Heard in October

An unusual case is being prosecuted by the officers of Charlevoix county and will be brought on for trial at the the October term of circuit court.

It is alleged thnt on August 31st, a Mr. and Mrs. William Herbert Sears of Boyne City, came to the office of the register of deeds and asked to see a certain deed which had been given to the register of deeds for recording. Mrs. Frank Bird, deputy register, handed them the deed whieh had not yet been recorded, and while Mrs. Bird was attending to other duties, the pair instead of returning the deed, took it and walked out of the office.

Mrs. Bird immediately summoned Deputy Sheriff Charles Marshall, who stopped the parties down on Bridge street, but not before they had torn the deed into small bits and thrown it into some catch basins. They were taken into custody and later a warrant was issued, charging violation of the statute making it an offense to carry away or mutilate public records.

Deputy Sheriff Marshall later fished the pieces of paper out or the catch basins, and Mrs. Bird was able to piece them together and record the document.

No case of this character has ever been known in the history of the county. Doubtless the offending parties did not fully appreciate the seriousness of their crime.

It is with due credit to the sheriff's department that we mention the fact that Charlevoix has been practically free of crime this summer. There has been no serious traffic accidents and very little thievery with the exception of the usual run of petty crimes. This condition and the splendid co-operation of county officers is a great satisfaction to Charlevoix and the county as a whole.

PARMELEE AWARDED CONTRACT FOR LODGE

R. E. Olds Will Build on His Lake Charlevoix Property

R. E. Olds, wealthy automobile manufacturer of Lansing, Mich., has let the contract for his new summer home, Oldswood Lodge, which will be located on his property known as Pine Point on Lake Charlevnix, to W. E. Parmelee, local contractor.

Work on the new lodge, which will be one of the finest in the north, will be started at once. Plans call for a main structure 103 by 34 feet, with a wing 40 by 34 feet. The lodge will have a large living room, dining room, library and seventeen bedrooms with running water, shower baths and all modern conveniences.

WILL ELECT OFFICERS FOR 1927

AT ANNUAL MEETING IN MANISTEE OCTOBER 5-6

Two Day Event With Fine Program Should Have Representatives From Every County

The annual meeting of the members of the Michigan Tourist and Resort association will take piace in Manistee, October 5 and 6. The program of the two days' activities has not yet been completed hut it is expected there will be attractive features for all those interested in and the general progress of Michigan as a resort state. Supervisors, city and village authorities and all others interested in the development of Western Michignn, whether members of the association or not, are cordially invited to attend the business meetings, as well as the evening banquet.

Mr. Hugh J. Grey, Grand Rapids, secretary-manager of the association, will submit a detailed financial report and a description of the activities entered upon during the past year. To determine what resort centers have been doing to accommodate the increasing number of tourists, questionaires were mailed out from the tourist association office requesting among other things the numbers of cottages erected nnd the average cost of each. One hundred and ten replies were received giving 354 as the number of cottages built at the average cost of $3,000 each.

Mr. Grey has announced that a nationnl expert on resort subdivisions will appear before the convention with valuable suggestions aa to the future program in that type of work in Western Michigan.

commissioner, has accepted an invitation to talk nbout the road conditions and the contemplated improvements and additions of roads for this coming year.

P. J. Hoffmaster, superintendent of state parks, will submit the 1927 park program.

R. C. Haven, past president, Central Michigan Safety council is also included on the program and will give some salient facts about safety work nnd the present and future programs of that orgnnization.

A. P. Johnson, acting secretary of the Wolverine Foundation is expected to bring out some interesting impressions of the work of that institution and viewpoints of the general public toward the work now being carried on by the tourist association and other associations affiliated with it in the interests of Western Michigan as a "Playground of a nation."

Thirty-two directors will be elected for the coming year. The executive committee consists of 7 men who have charge of the organization and direct the policy.

The business meetings are to be held in Ramsdell Hall, the first business session convening at 10:00 a. m. central standard time, Tuesday, October 5. A banquet for the members attending the convention will be held in the diningrooms of the Chippewa Hotel at 6:00 p. m. central standard time, October 5.

It is expected that the business will be completed by 3 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, when the meeting will adjourn.

Charlevoix and its Association of Commerce should be represented at this meeting.

NEW SUMMER CAMP ON SHORES OF PINE LAKE

Ann Arbor People Have Purchased D'Ooge Farm for New Site

Mr. and Mrs. George R. Swain of Ann Arbor, who recently purchased the D'Ooge farm, located on the north shore of Pine lake, on the Charlevoix-Boyne City road, will move their girls' summer camp, Kamp Kairphree, which has formerly been located at Alpena, to their new holdings.

Mr. and Mrs. Swain, who personally conduct the camp, are both graduates of the University of Michigan, and have both had years of experience in handling camps of Camp Fire Girls and intimately know boys and girls. Work on new buildings will be started in the spring and the camp put in shape for the summer season.

Has Done Good Service

Practically all the world's vessels are dwarfs compared with the Italian ship Anita, which was broken up during the present century at Genoa. She was built in the days of Queen Elizabeth, and for well over three centuries had sailed the world's seas. She was not only the oldest but the slowest ship in existence. No wonder, for her hull was of oak 12 inches thick.

This country is claimed to be getting overcrowded, and the front seats of some automobiles operated by the younger element certainly look so.

MONEY TO BURN!

$562,751,466!

That was our nation's fire-loss in 1925, according to the National Board of Fire Underwriters, the country's authority on the subject.

$13,689,432!—that was the increase over 1924. The increase in the annual fire-loss since 1923 is $403,759,969!

Who pays this tremendous annual tribute to destruction? Not only the owners of the property destroyed. Not only the families of the 20,000 persons who die in fires every year. Every resident of the country pays his share.

For this loss, exceeding half a billion dollars annually, is what keeps insurance rates high. These destructive fires—one dwelling house burns in our country every four minutes day and night!—are what make it necessary for the taxpayers to maintain fire departments. The national fire-loss is a national problem. For that reason, President Coolidge has set apart this week for public instruction as to the causes of fires and means of preventing them.

Just what this half-billion-dollar drain on our national wealth means may be visualized this way. Uncle Sam, in taxing the incomes of his people, allows an exemption of $200 for every child. That is exempted, presumably, because it is sufficient to keep a child in school for a year. On this basis, it appears that the money we waste by fires every year would keep more than 2,000,000 children in school.

Yet we go on wasting it—for it is waste because it can be prevented. Insurance experts, fire department officials and engineers firmly state that 75 per cent of the fires that cause this tremendous total loss are preventable.

How? By being careful with matches, cigars and cigarets? Certainly; that would help. By keeping chimneys clean so that they don't throw burning embers upon roofs? Surely; that's a wise precaution. These measures—all measures of common-sense carefulness are necessary.

But caution alone won't save our nation $562,751,466. What is needed more is precaution. The reason why buildings burn is that they are built so they will burn. The fundamental way to prevent their burning is to "Build so it won't burn."

This doesn't necessarily mean that the average home-owner must adopt expensive masonry constructions to substitute the traditional American wood-frame house. It means to build wisely with wood—use wood but protect it at its most vulnerable points.

The development of modern building materials has made this possible at a cost no greater than that of unprotected construction. For example: A wood frame can be sheathed with incombustible mineral in place of inflammable wood sheathing. On the inside of the frame a gypsum lath—literally a rock lath—can be used in place of tinder-like wood lath. An artistic and beautiful exterior finish can be put on the house through the use of colored stucco. Or brick or stone may be used. The roof can be of slate, asbestos, cement tile or other fire-resistive material. Insulation and fire-stopping can be installed in one operation between walls, floors and over ceilings through the use of dry-fill gypsum.

This is the path to an appreciable reduction in our enormous annual fire-loss and protection for yourself and your family: Fire-safe construction.

How much money have you to burn?

MICHIGAN IS DRY

The growing suspicion in some localities that Michigan was swinging back into the wet column was dissipated in the recent primary, when Congressman Grant M. Hudson was renominated by an overwhelming majority over Rev. Pengelly, of Flint, who had the endorsement and active assistance of the wets. Hudson's victory is all the more emphatic when it is known that his district embraces the large industrial city of Flint, as well as several townships in Wayne county.

Another indication that the state is still in the dry column is seen in the record run made by Luren D. Dickinson for lieutenant governor. By common consent Dickinson has for years represented the bone dry vote in Michigan, and the fact that he was nominated over Welsh and Riopelle, who had wet support, without even making a campaign for the office, shows the preponderance of dry sentiment that exists in the state, especially in the rural sections.

Our idea of extended memories are the fellows who continue to blame Adam for their own downfall.

Attention Radio Fans

Most of you have been anxiously waiting for the time when you can pay some attention to your Radio Sets.

In less than a month Radio programs from all stations will be available to all good Receiving Sets. Our experience of last fall and winter has proven the superiority of the Bremmer-Tulley Sets to all others sold in Charlevoix. We are adding to our lines the famous Bush & Lane line, which will probably prove equal if not superior to the Bremmer-Tulleys.

We will continue to carry the Pfanstheil and Chelsea lines which are as good as most sets made, but at a lower price than the more powerful ones. Come in and let us demonstrate and explain the qualities of these sets.

Patience's little voice rose to a wail. "No one cuily but Lyd."

She lifted the sleepy baby easily and Patience dropped her soft cheek against Lydia's and closed her eyes again. Lydia turned to Marshall. Her face was very serious.

"I know I was awful bad, Mr. Marshall, and maybe you feel as if you ought to lick me."

"Put your little sister to bed," said Marshall gravely, "and then we'll see."

There was silence in the room for a moment after Lydia left it, then Amos said, "I'll be glad to do anything I can, Marshall."

"Neither of you'll lay a finger on Lydia," interrupted Lizzie—"if you want to lick anyone, go lick Elviry Marshall, the fool! Why, I knew her when she was my niece's hired girl and you, Dave Marshall, was selling cans of tomatoes over a counter. And she's bringing that young one up to be a silly little fool. Mark my words, she'll be the prey of the first fortune-hunter that comes along."

Neither Amos nor his caller spoke. In a few minutes Lydia's step sounded on the stairs. The last of the sunset glow caught her hair, and the fine set of her head on her square little shoulders was never more pronounced than as she walked slowly toward Dave Marshall.

"I never had a licking," she said, "but I guess I deserve one and so you'd better do it and get it done, Mr. Marshall."

CHAPTER III

The Cottage

Marshall cleared his throat and reaching out, took Lydia by the arm and pulled her toward him. He could feel her muscles stiffen under his touch. The bright red color left her cheeks.

"I wouldn't think much of your father, my child," he said, huskily, "if he let me whip you, even if I wanted to."

Lydia took a quick look up into his face. Then she gave a little gasping sigh, her lips quivered and she leaned against his knee.

"Look here, Lydia," said Dave Marshall, "this is to be your punishment. I want you and Kent to teach Margery how to swim and how to get dirty, see? Let her play with you 'common kids,' will you?"

"Will her mother let her?" asked Lydia.

"Yes," answered Dave, grimly.

"All right," said Lydia, with a little sigh.

"I know it'll be a hard job," Marshall interpreted the sigh quickly; "that's where the punishment comes in."

"Lydia'll do it. I'll see to it," said Amos.

"You keep out, Dudley. This is between Lydia and me. How about it, Lydia?"

"If you'll boss her mother, I'll boss Margery and Kent," said Lydia, with a sudden laugh.

"It's a bargain." Marshall rose. "Good night, Dudley."

"Good night, Marshall."

Amos followed his caller to the door. As he did so Lydia heard Kent's whistle in the back yard. She joined him and the two withdrew to a bench behind the woodshed.

"I saw him through the window," said Kent, in a low voice. "What's he going to do to us? Dad's licked me, so that much is done."

Lydia told of their punishment. "Darn it," groaned Kent, "I'd rather had another licking. I certainly do hate girl."

"So do I," agreed Lydia. "Nothing to look forward to but worry now. O gee, Kent, I've got two pennies! One's Patience's. But let's go spend the other at Spence's!"

"Gum or all-day sucker?" asked Kent, who, in spite of the fact that he owned a second-hand bicycle, was not above sharing a penny.

"Come On, Lyd, Before You're Called In."

"Gum lasts longer," suggested Lydia.

"What kinda gum, spruce or white or tutti-frutti?"

"You can choose."

"Spruce then. It makes the most juice. Come on, Lyd, before you're called in."

And thus ended the heroic day.

No one ever knew what Dave Marshall said to Elviry, his wife, but a day or so after, little Margery, in a fine white flannel bathing suit, appeared on the sand, about a quarter of a mile below the Willows.

Kent was a quitter! After the rescue he decided to eschew the society of girls forever and he struck a bargain with Lydia that she could have the use of his bicycle one day a week till snow came if she would undertake the disciplining of the banker's daughter alone. For such a bribe Lydia would have undertaken to teach Elviry Marshall, herself, to swim—and so the bargain was struck.

Lydia's method of teaching was one employed by most of the children of Lake City when a new child moved into the town. She forced Margery to float face downward in the water, again and again, while she counted ten. After one afternoon of this, the banker's daughter had forever lost her fear of the water and the rest was easy.

In spite of the relationship Dave Marshall had established between the two children, Margery and Lydia did not like each other. One Saturday afternoon, after banking hours, Marshall was seated on his front porch, with Elviry and Margery, when Lydia appeared. She stood on the steps in her bathing suit, her bare feet in a pair of ragged "sneakers." Her face and hands and ankles were dirty but her eyes and the pink of her cheeks were clear.

"Come on, Marg," said Lydia, "and, Mr. Marshall, please, won't you come too and see how well she does it?"

"Run and get into your bathing suit, daughter," said Marshall. "Elviry, want to come?"

"No," snapped Elviry. "Lydia, how do you manage to get so dirt when to my positive knowledge you're in the water an hour every day?"

Lydia blushed and tried to hide one ankle behind the other. "I think you're terrible impolite," she murmured.

Dave roared with laughter. "Right you are, Lydia! I guess I'll have to hitch up and drive us all over."

They drove to the Willows and Margery went through her paces, while her father watched and applauded from the shore. When they had finished and had run up and down to warm up and dry off and were driving home, Dave said:

"You'd better come in to supper with us, Lydia."

"No, thank you," answered the child. "Mr. Levine's coming to supper at our house and I have to cook it."

"Hum!" What does John Levine do at your house, so much?"

"Oh, he's going into politics," answered Lydia, innocently, "and Dad advises him."

"Well, tell them you've done a fine job as a swimming teacher," Dave spoke carelessly. "I don't see why Levine wants to get into politics. He's doing well in real estate."

"Oh!" exclaimed Lydia, with a child's importance at having real news to impart, "he's going into politics so's to get some Indian land."

"Like h—l he is!" exclaimed Marshall.

"Oh, daddy!" Margery's voice was exactly like her mother's.

They were turning into the Marshall driveway and Marshall's face was a curious mixture of amusement and irritation. He kissed his little daughter when he lifted her from the buggy and bade her run to the house. Before he lifted Lydia down he paused and as he stood on the ground and she sat in the surrey, she looked levelly into his black eyes.

"I wish I had another little daughter like you, Lydia," he said. "I don't see why—but God, you can't get swans from barnyard fowls." He continued to study Lydia's face. "Some day, my child, you'll make some man's heart break, or lift him up to heaven."

Lydia squirmed.

"Margery's taught now," she said hastily, "so I don't have to be punished any more, do I?"

Marshall scowled slightly. "What do you mean? Don't you want Margery to play with you?"

"Oh, sure, she can play, if she wants to, but I mean I don't have to go get her and bring her into our games."

"No," said Dave slowly, "but I think it would be nice of you to sort of keep an eye on her and get her dirty once in a while. There! Run home, child, you're shivering."

With puzzled eyes, Lydia obeyed.

The most important result, as far as Lydia was interested, of the talk between her father and Levine that night was that Amos decided definitely to move the following week.

Lydia did not see the new home until she rode out with the first dray-load of furniture. She sat in the high seat beside the driver, baby Patience in her lap, her thin, long little legs dangling, her cheeks scarlet with excitement and the warmth of a hot September morning. The cottage was a mile from the old home. They drove along the maple-shaded street for the first half of the distance, then turned into a dirt road that led toward the lake shore. The dirt road emerged on the shore a half mile above the Willows and wound along a high embankment, crowned with oaks.

An old-fashioned white cottage, with green blinds and a tiny front porch, stood beside the road, its back to the lake. There were five acres or so of ground around the house, set off by a white picket fence. At the gate a pine tree stood. There were oaks and lilac bushes in the front yard. Through the leaves, Lydia saw the blue of the lake.

"Our yard runs right down to the water!" she cried, as the driver lift-

A Word With the Old Folks

Elderly People Are Learning Importance of Good Elimination.

IN the later years of life there is apt to be a slowing up of the bodily functions. Good elimination, however, is just as essential to the old as to the young. Many old folks have learned the value of Doan's Pills when a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys is required. Scanty or burning passages of kidney secretions are often signs of improper kidney function. In most every community are scores of users and endorsers who acclaim the merit of Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

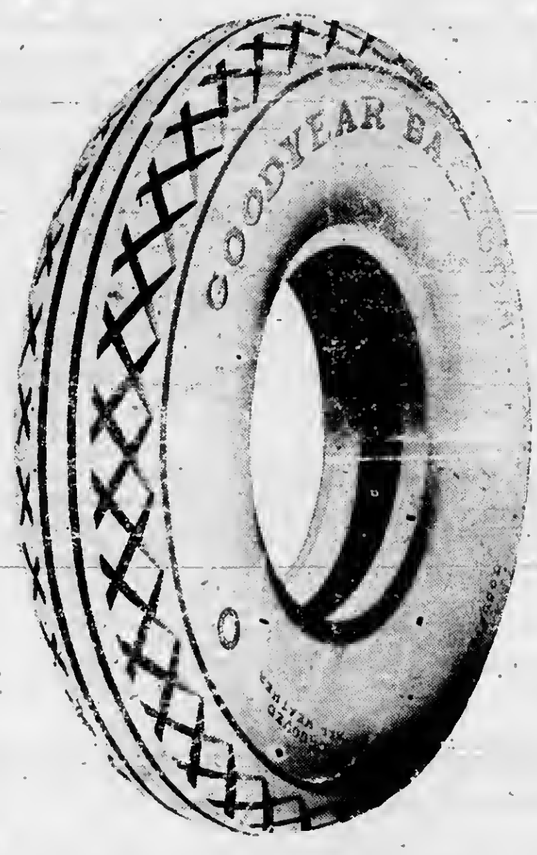
WHY NOT BUY TIRE MILEAGE!



The air is full of "tire bargains" these days. An automobile owner can get his tires at just about any price or on any terms he wants.

Yet--after all--what you want is what the tire can deliver---trouble free miles.

Most tires look alike when they're new--they all look good in the display rack. Perhaps that's why low first cost influence many tire buyers.

We sell you tire mileage---not tires. Goodyears, from the low priced Pathfinder to the wonderful new Heavy Duty made of Supertwist, will actually deliver the miles you buy. Every tire backed up by our service.

The Age of "Wild Oats"

Someone has aptly described the years from twenty to thirty in a man's life as the "wild oat" years,—where he has everything to gain and nothing to lose. If the man from twenty to thirty would just realize that this period in his life is the best of all tlmes to start accumulating a surplus, he would in later life, have fewer regrets, attain success more rapidly and be able to enjoy life sooner.

Instead of sowing the "wild oats" in the twenty to thirty period, SAVE. It pays big dividends.

SIMPLIFY GOVERNMENT MACHINERY

In an article in the Nation's Business, Congressman Wood of Indiana, discusses very forcibly the many independent bureaus in Washington which are under no department, are responsible to no Cabinet officer, yet supervise numerous activities of the Federal Government. The Congressman believes that there should be a wholesale weeding out or definite control of these bureaus. Much has been done in Washington to simplify governmental functions, but much apparently still remains to be done. The tendency of the present day in business and government is toward simplicity and one can readily sympathize with Congressman Wood in his desire to eliminate needless job holders. He points out that these bureaus are constantly disturbing work and are mutually jealous. He believes that a survey would get rid of a great amount of dead wood and reduce the number of employees perhaps by thousands. These bureaus are tucked away all over Washington and many of them do not exercise any useful function. Everything which can be done to simplify the machinery of government means an easier time for business men in their dealings with the government and eliminates red tape and interference which are esssential nuisances.

THE RED SCHOOL HOUSE

A casual study of the educational history of the state emphasizes the remarkable development which has occurred during the last decade. The famous "little old red school house" now is legendary. Its place has been taken by a building designed in modern fashion and equipped for the convenience of the student and faculty. Schools are easily accessible in virtually all localities and, under the direction of the State Department of Education, courses and methods have been so systematized and improved as to permit the youth of Michigan adequate training.

DENOUNCES INTOLERANCE

So long as the majority of people, who are also the workers, interest themselves in the affairs of government, American institutions will benefit the American working man and the Republic will continue to live, according to Senator James W. Wadsworth, Jr., in his speech at the Labor Day celebration of the Central Trades and Labor Council of New York. The Senator denounced intolerance as the principal menace to the progress of the United States. Whether his hearers construe this as intolerance of labor unions, or something else, we do not of course know. But the Senator in another part of his speech espoused the right of every man to pick his own job and said:

"The average man wants to select his own occupation and to change it when he desires. He does not want some higher power, far removed from his sight and control, to tell him that he must work at a certain job and accept the judgment of that higher power as to whether he is receiving suficient reward for his labor. He knows that if he submits to a control of that sort he will lose his liberty and his self-respect. If he finds himself unable alone to resist some power seeking to impose its will upon him he will join with others similarly threatened to set up a power capable of successful resistance.

"Many of our troubles in this world come from the attempt of some person or group of persons or of Government itself to hold other people down and make them obey some rigid rule of conduct in the framing of which the victims have had no part."

MAYOR OF MIAMI

Mayor E. C. Romfh of Miami was in New York when the hurricane hit Florida, and started at once for his stricken city.

Another changed condition of basic importance is the increased efficiency of the railroads since their return from Government to private control. More efficient railroad service is one of the prime causes of universal hand-to-mouth buying, which has caused a large reduction in merchandise inventories; and business men now look for profit from a rapid turn-over of inventories rather than from speculative buying.

CHICAGO CLUB MAKING IMPROVEMENTS

Will Remodel and Lengthen Pier in Lake Charlevoix

Roe Brothers of Harbor Springs, who have just completed five new yacht slips at the foot of Antrim street for the city, have moved their equipment to Lake Charlevoix and have started work remodeling the Chicago Club dock.

Receding water in Lake Charlevoix had left the dock nearly four feet above the water. The dock will be cut down to 20 inches and lengthened to reach over the channel bank. A crew of men are also tearing down the old swimming pool, formerly owned and operated by the Pere Marquette railroad, and which was acquired lately by the Chicago Club.

FISHERMAN IS CAUGHT IN WIND

Engine Fails and Ship Drifts Far Off Bay Shore Shoals

Not all Petoskey and northern folks know just how much danger commercial fishermen must brave in order that fresh fish may be netted for the tables of thousands of families and hotels of this region, but Claude Bachelor, Petoskey fisherman, knows all about it. Mr. Bachelor was rescued during Tuesday's hard south wind, five miles out on Lake Michigan by Harry Miller, also of Petoskey, in the Petoskey Fish Market gasoline boat "Pioneer."

It all came about this way:

Mr. Bachelor, Frank Schapler and Mr. Miller and his crew were lifting nets off the Bay Shore shoals when the squall struck. The "Pioneer," the largest boat of the fleet, made the lee of the land easily. Mr. Schapler had some difficulty with his boat flooding but kept bailing and his engine kept right on working. Upon reaching shelter Miller noticed that Bachelor's boat appeared still at the fishing grounds. Using his glasses he discovered that the boat was about three miles off the shoals and rapidly drifting northward.

He turned the nose of his ship north again and hurried to the crippled fisherman. Upon arrival he found Bachelor tired out with his efforts to keep his ship bailed out and with trying to start his engine. A rope was passed to the launch and boat and owner brought safely to shore.—Petoskey News.

BAPTIST CHURCH

Sunday will be observed as Rally Day, morning and evening. It is hoped and expected that all our members and friends will be present.

The Mission Circle will meet at the Kibbe home Wednesday afternoon, October 5th. All women in the congregation are invited to attend.

The church annual meeting will be held with pot-luck supper Monday afternoon. Dr. Armstrong will tell us of his Cuban trip, and Rev. Wm. Ross of Petoskey, is also expected to bring us an inspirational message. All members of the congregation are expected to be present.

NEW PALACE THEATRE

ATTRACTIONS FOR THE COMING WEEK

Saturday and Sunday, October 2 and 3

"THE NEW COMMANDMENT" with Blanche Sweet and Ben Lyon. To him who had known many loves came the angel of Flanders. Her tender hands reshaped a life pledged to finish on a field where win or lose, all are heroes. From her lips he heard the new commandment. From the novel "Invisible Wounds," by Col. Frederick Palmer. Also a comedy, "Meet My Girl."

Monday and Tuesday, October 4 and 5

"THE WILDERNESS WOMAN," with Aileen Pringle, Lowell Sherman and Chester Conklin. She has a punch like dynamite, a figure like a queen, a temper like a tornado, the soul of a baby girl and the heart of a woman. Her father made a million with a pick. She helped him spend it with a shovel. And when love comes into her life, why, you'd better be there to see the fun. Comedy, "Who's My Wife," also "Felix the Cat."

Wednesday and Thursday, October 6 and 7

Pola Negri in "THE CROWN OF LIES" with Noah Beery in the cast. The truth about "The Crown of Lies" is that it's Pola's finest film. And she's every inch a queen in her gorgeous gowns. Also Fox News.

Friday, October 8

"THE SECRET SPRING." See the bathing beauties of L'Erotic, Paris' leading cabaret. The big royal wedding. Wild auto chase. Spectacular fireworks display. Also a Comedy, "Soapsuds Lady."

COMMUNICATIONS

Our last few days in Michigan, we left Manistee Sunday, September 12th at 10:00 a. m. dined at Muskegon and arrived at Grand Rapids at 4:00 p. m., a benutiful ride on concrete roads. Of course we pulled up at the Pantlind hotel, the home of tourists, commercial men and all others in pursuit of happiness, comfort and the best things to eat, all these things with the best of service. Everybody loves the Pantlind, which under the management of Fred Pantlind, is considered one of the very best hotels in the United States. We remained here until Tuesday p. m. and then motored to Lansing. This being primary election day everything was closed, so we rested.

Wednesday we called on our good old reliable State Highway Engineer, Mr. Frank F. Rogers, who gave me great encouragement for the changing of the Dixie Highway in Charlevoix from Bridge street onto Dixon avenue, via the P. M. Hotel Inn, passing by beautiful Lake Charlevoix on the Petosky Road, or M-11, as it is now known.

We then drove from Lansing to Flint and this Wednesday p. m. and evening was without a doubt one of the happiest I huve had in many a moon. Just let me tell you about it, as a lot of you fellows know Ben Bennett and his wife both lived with the Van Pelts at Norwood for several years something like twenty-five to thirty years ago. Well, Ben Bennett was what we called an extra good man. Sometimes we called him a ripping good man, and his wife, Jessie Bennett, was even a better man than Ben. They not only worked for us, hut they raised an awfully good family. When the World War was on, Roscoe, their oldest son, volunteered, went across and while in France he wrote the most beautiful letters to his mother thut I have ever read. After the war was over he began working for the Buick people in Flint. His father and his brother Howard also worked for them. Then ha wrote me a letter saying, "We three are pnying $9.00 a week for our board and we cannot rent a house to live in. The General Motors company are buihling a subdivision and if I had $600.00 I could buy n home, but he said he did not know how or where to get it, and that his father suggested he should write to Uncle George and perhaps he could tell them how they could get it. This he did and they now have the house, a fine home, and it was there we lind our party and a dinner I will never forget.

The hotel porches are getting a little cool for news gatherings, consequently we have adjourned to the lobbies.

One traveler told me of an experience made with a magnet, which was placed on the rear end of a truck and in five miles it picked up 150 lbs. of scrap iron, nails, etc. It is an experiment made for the purpose of showing thut nails and such like things can be picked up by a magnet and many punctures could thereby be prevented.

Is the world growing better or "worser"? Judging from the fact that many people who went to church "years and years" ago, but who during the war and other unusual excitements, such ns the fulse land booms in Florida and around the shores of our great lakes and smaller bodies of water, became "cool" and they withdrew from the church or lost interest in religious matters. They became estranged from the church, and golf probably had more to do with it than any other one thing. Well, these men are now remaining at home and listening to splendid sermons now being broadcasted throughout the land by Radio. During the golf game these sermons are being cussed and discussed. Cussed because the preachers can hammer the truth to the unbelieving in strong terms and not be worried as to their salaries. We may seem disinterested boys, but we all know that there is u God and it is His laws that must be obeyed and learn that there is no such thing as buying our way into the Kingdom of Heaven with money. It is a dead sure thing that we must work out our own salvation, Lions and other elubs in which they call attention to the eternal life beyond this present one, is resulting in enabling us to answer this question in the affirmative. Yes, the world is growing better. This leads to another question. What are you and what am I doing to make the world grow better? One man in the lobby said," I hope the world is now worse for my having lived in it". It was my pleasure last Sunday night to listen to a wonderfully good sermon over the Radio. The subject was "Good Will." This sermon is one which we can all preach to both ourselves and to others and if followed up practically it will be productive of much good.

I continue sending my letters to the papers in Charlevoix in hope that if not already convinced you will be convinced by reading them of the foolishness, yea the actual sin and wastefullness of building anything but concrete roads on all our main thoroughfares and that you will use your influence in favor of building them to the exclusion of all other, not only in our own county but in our adjoining counties. If you are now absolutely convinced of our great need of the concrete road around Lake Charlevoix, the reading of this letter and all others to follow may still strengthen your convictions and stimulate your efforts in this great cause. The hundreds of millions of dollars that have been wastefully spent on imitation roads in the United States would go a long way in paying our national debt.

I have interviewed several men regarding the Covert Act plan in getting roads, and all, without a single exception, say, it is a good plan. Now convince yourselves and if you too are convinced go-to-it, for it will be the making of Charlevoix county and will put it uhead of all other counties as a summer resort. Don't take my word for it but live and learn nnd see for yourself. Then you can safely and consistently blow your own horn.

"Uncle" Geo. VanPelt.

ed the baby down and she followed after. "Gee! I'm glad we moved!"

Lydia looked along the road, where an occasional house was to be seen.

"I hope kids live in those houses," she said, "but if they don't, baby and the lake are company enough for me, and Kent can come out on his wheel."

She ran through the little house eagerly. It was full of windows and being all on one floor, gave a fine effect of spaciousness. It was an old house but in excellent repair as was all John Levine's property.

Lizzie arrived on the third and final load. She brought with her a lunch that they shared with the driver. He good-naturedly set up the kitchen stove and the three beds for them and departed with the hope that they would not be too lonesome.

Lydia and old Lizzie put in an afternoon of gigantic effort. By six o'clock, the beds were made, dishes unpacked and in the china closet, the table was set for supper and an Irish stew of Lydia's make was simmering on the stove.

When Amos came up the path at a half after six, his dinner pail in his hand, he found Lydia flat on her back on the little front porch. Her curly head was wet with perspiration; face, hands and blouse were black. The baby sat beside her, trying to get Florence Doubey to sleep.

"Well," said Amos, looking down on his family, "how do you like it, Lydia?"

"It's great! My back's broken! Supper's ready."

"You shouldn't lift heavy things, child! How often have I told you? Wait until I get home."

"I want to get things done," replied Lydia, "so's I can do a little playing before school opens. Come on in and see all we've done, daddy."

She forgot her aching back and led the way into the house. Amos was as excited and pleased as the children and Lizzie, so tired that her old hands shook, was as elated as the others.

"It's much more roomy than the old house and all on one floor. 'Twill save me the stairs. And the garden'll be fine," she said, failing to call attention to the fact that the water was far from the house and that there was no kitchen sink.

"We've got to try to keep this place cleaner than we did the other," said Amos. "Lydia, better wash up for supper."

"Oh, daddy," said Lydia, "I'm too tired! Don't make me!"

"All right," answered Amos, "but your mother was always clean and so am I. I don't see where you get it."

"Maybe one of my ancestors was a garbage man," suggested Lydia, sliding into her place at the table.

She allowed Lizzie to carry Patience into their bedroom after supper and Amos, smoking in the yard and planning the garden for next year, waited in vain to hear "Beulah Land" and "Wreathe me no gaudy chaplet" float to him from the open window.

"Where's Lydia, Lizzie?" he asked as the old lady came out to empty the dishwater.

"She ain't come out yet. Maybe she's fell asleep, too."

The two tip-toed to the window. On the bed under the covers was little Patience, fast asleep, and, beside her, on top of the covers, fully dressed, lay Lydia, an arm across her little sister, in the sleep of utter exhaustion.

"I'll just take her shoes off and cover her and leave her till morning," said Lizzie.

But Amos, gazing at his two ill-kempt little daughters, at the chaotic room, did not answer except to murmur to himself, "Oh, Patience! Patience!"

The cottage was somewhat isolated. Amos was three-quarters of a mile from his work. The schoolhouse was a mile away and the nearest trolley, which Lizzie must take to do the family shopping, was half a mile back along the dirt road.

Nevertheless, all the family felt that they had taken a distinct step upward in moving into lake shore property and nobody complained of distances. Amos began putting in his Sundays in cleaning up the bramble-grown acres he intended to turn into a garden in the spring. He could not afford to have it plowed so he spaded it all himself, during the wonderful bright fall Sabbaths. Nor was this a hardship for Amos. Only the farm bred can realize the reminiscent joy he took in wrestling with the sod, which gave up the smell that is more deeply familiar to man than any other in the range of human experience.

A dairy farmer named Norton, up the road, gave him manure in exchange for the promise of early vegetables for his table. After his spading was done in late September, Amos with his wheelbarrow, followed by the two children, began his trips between the dairy farm and his garden patch and he kept these up until the garden was deep with fertilizer.

Lydia was happier than she had been since her mother's death. She took the long tramps to and from school, lunch box and schoolbag slung at her back, in a sort of ecstacy. She was inherently a child of the woods and fields. Their beauty thrilled her while it tranquilized her. Some of the weight of worry and responsibility that she had carried since her baby sister of two weeks had been turned over to her care left her.

John Levine came home with Amos one night to supper. Amos felt safe about an unexpected guest on Saturday nights for there was always a pot of baked beans, at the baking of which Lizzie was a master hand, and there were always biscuits. Lydia was expert at making these. She had taken of late to practicing with her mother's old cook book and Amos felt as if he were getting a new lease of gastronomic life.

"Well," said Levine, after supper was finished, the baby was asleep and

"Where'd You Get That Dress, My Dear?" He Asked.

Lydia was established with a copy of "The Water Babies" he had brought her, "I had an interesting trip, this week."

Amos tossed the bag of tobacco to Levine. "Where?"

"I put in most of the week on horseback up on the reservation. Amos, the place land up in there is something to dream of. Why, there's nothing like it left in the Mississippi valley, nor hasn't been for twenty years. Have you ever been up there?"

Amos shook his head. "I've just never had time. It's an awful trip. No railroad, twenty-mile drive—"

Levine nodded. "The Indians are in awful bad shape up there. Agent's in it for what he can get, I guess. Don't know as I blame him. The sooner the Indians are gone the better it'll be for us and all concerned."

"What's the matter with 'em?" asked Lydia.

"Consumption—some kind of eye disease—starvation—"

The child shivered and her eyes widened.

"You'd better go on with the 'Water Babies,'" said John. "Has Tom fallen into the river yet?"

"No, he's just seen himself in the mirror," answered Lydia, burying her nose in the delectable tale again.

"It's a wonderful story," said Levine, his black eyes reminiscent. "It has some unforgettable verse in it. Well, as I was saying, Amos, that timber isn't going to stay up there and rot—because, I'm going to get it out of there!"

"How?" asked Amos.

"Act of congress, maybe. Maybe a railroad will get a permit to go through, eh? There are several ways. We'll die rich, yet, Amos."

Amos pulled at his pipe and shook his head. "You will but I won't. It isn't in our blood."

"Shucks, Amos. Where's your nerve?"

Amos looked at Levine silently for a moment. Then he said huskily:

"My nerve is gone with Patience. And if she isn't in heaven, there isn't one, that's all."

Lydia looked up from her story with a quick flash of tragedy in her eyes.

"Well," said John, smiling at her gently, "if you don't want to be rich, Amos, Lydia does. I'll give her the cottage here, the first fifty thousand I make off of Indian pine lands."

"Mr. Marshall says 'like h—l you'll get some Indian lands,'" mused the child.

Both men exclaimed together, "What!"

Lydia was confused but repeated her conversation with Marshall.

"So that's the way the wind blows," said Levine.

"You don't think for a minute there's a banker in town without one found on the reservation," said Amos. "Lydia, you're old enough now not to repeat conversations you hear at home. Don't you ever tell anybody the things you hear me and Mr. Levine talk over. Understand?" sharply.

"Yes, daddy," murmured Lydia, flushing painfully.

"You don't have to jaw the child that way, Amos." Levine's voice was impatient. "Just explain things to her. Why do you want to humiliate her?"

Amos gave a short laugh. "Takes a bachelor to bring up kids. Run along to bed, Lydia."

"Lydia's not a kid. She's a grown-up lady in disguise," said Levine, catching her hand as she passed and drawing her to him. "Good night, young Lydia! If you were ten years older and I were ten years younger—"

Lydia smiled through tear-dimmed eyes. "We'd travel!" she said.

Amos, always a little moody and a little restless, since the children's mother had gone to her last sleep, grew more so as the end of the year approached. It was perhaps a week before Christmas on a Sunday afternoon that he called Lydia to him. Patience was having her nap and Lizzie had gone to call on Mrs. Norton.

Lydia, who was re-reading "The Water Babies," put it down reluctantly and came to her father's side. Her heart thumped heavily. Her father's depressed voice meant just one thing—money trouble. Amos hesitated:

"Where'd you get that dress, my dear?" he asked.

"Lizzie and I made it of that one of mother's," answered the child. "It isn't made so awful good, but I like to wear it, because it was hers."

"Yes, yes," said Amos absently.

The dress was a green serge, clumsily put together as a sailor suit, and the color fought desperately with the transparent blue of the little girl's eyes.

AT THE MOVIES

Negri's "Crown of Lies" Colorful Romantic Drama

American girls have become countesses and duchesses through marrying foreign noblemen, but in "The Crown of Lies" which open at the Palace Thentre on Wednesday and Thursday, Pola Negri becomes a queen who ends up by wedding a likeable young American flivver salesman, in order to rule his tiny cottage.

Mystery Melodrama Due at the Palace

In "The Secret Spring," a Paramount picture which comes to the Palace Theatre on October 8, we are promised a luxurious modern melodrama, a story of court intrigue, a tale of love, devotion and self-sacrifice, and last but not least, a glimpse of Paris as it really it.

War Films on Way, Says Fitzmaurice

The trend back towards war as a setting and theme for motion picture drama is becoming evident. George Fitzmaurice points out that his production of "The Dark Angel" and Robert T. Kane's recently completed First National picture, "The New Commandment," adapted from Frederick Palmer's "Invisible Wounds," are the first two concrete examples of this cinema trend.

"Though there is a natural reaction against any subject dealing with war for some time after one has been fought, it is nevertheless my firm conviction that there can be more thrills, more romance, even comedy, injected in one reel of a good war story than in a dozen of an every-day drama of life. Palace Theatre, Saturday and Sunday, October 2 and 3.

"It is a well known fact," says Mr. Fitzmaurice, "that after every war no artistic or dramatic expression of war is attempted by producers or permitted by the public for a period of time. For that period the people are fed up on war and all of its grim realities. But after a five-year period there comes the pent-up expression. And now it is upon us. The first two pictures with flashes of the war forming the basis of their dramatic themes are 'The Dark Angel,' and 'The New Commandment.'

The public is said to read its newspapers carelessly, but may who have advertised that they would give away a 10-cent article will not say so.

What "dependable" really means

Ponder the basic elements underlying Dodge Brothers remarkable success and one simple fact stands boldly out:

The public not only believe in the goodness of Dodge Brothers Motor Car, they believe in the men who build it and the men who sell it.

That is why the word DEPENDABLE is associated the world over with Dodge Brothers name. It goes beyond the product and embraces every department in Dodge Brothers great organization.

The tub's the thing!

Shaped right
Larger capacity
Keeps water hot longer
Strong cast aluminum
No seams to leak
No scouring necessary
Creates more effective water action

THE Maytag is the ONLY washer with a cast-aluminum tub—a tub cast in one piece of strong, thick aluminum! The Maytag tub keeps water hot for an entire washing! Keeps water clean because the dirt settles into the sediment trap beneath the gyratator!

The Maytag tub holds more clothes than other washers—the capacity is 21 gallons instead of the usual 17. There is no machinery inside the tub to take up clothes space—the tub is all washing room! The quicker-washed pieces can be taken from the Maytag while it is running and passed through the handily-low, conveniently-placed wringer that instantly adjusts itself to a handkerchief or a blanket, and wrings both dry.

After a washing is done, the Maytag tub automatically drains and cleans itself in 30 seconds. Nothing to scour or polish — no tiresome "cleaning-up" after a Maytag "wash-hour!"

The scientific shape of the tub, together with the gyratator, produces a more thorough, more cleansing water action. Keeps the soapier, more turbulent water continuously active in every inch of the tub, all of the time!

PURPOSE SERVICES SUNDAY EVENING

Unusual Program Planned for Methodist Episcopal Church

A anique Sunday evening hour is planned for the Sundny evening worship service at 7:30 at the First Methodist Episcopal church next Sunday evening. It will be a Key Noto service for the general church activities for the next three months. About four such extraordinary services are planned for the year, and they will be very happy events in Methodist church life.

The special features for next Sunday evening will be a key note sermon by the pastor with the subject, "The City Foursquare," piano and organ music, choral songs, entirely different from the usual Sunday evening hymnology. An unusuul prayer song under the lighted cross, a candle lighted church with a candle lighting purpose closing service. There will be special music and something for every one to do as an act of Divine worship. The public is invited to enjoy these happy, thoughtful and fitting services, and he on time for a good sitting.

PHELPS VISITED BY DESTRUCTIVE FIRE

Klooster General Store and Marketing Warehouse Burned to Ground

The general store at Phelps, owned and operated by F. R. Klooster, and the warehouse belonging to the Phelps Marketing association were completely destroyed by fire last Saturday morning at around eleven o'clock.

The blaze, it is believed, started in an upstairs bedroom over the Klooster store, where the family made their residence. With the limited fire fighting equipment at their disposal, those at the scene of the blaze were unable to put the flames out. The local department was called, but too late to save either the store or warehouse.

Most of the stock of groceries on the lower floor of the store were carried to safety, as was quite a quantity of produce from the association's warehouse. A large amount of beans and other produce was lost in the warehouse and the Klooster family lost most of their household goods.

The loss will be a severe one, as the store and warehouse were the only remaining industries in the once thriving little village. We understand that only partial insurance was curried, but the marketing association will start at once to rebuild a smaller warehouse. Mr. Klooster, we understand, has made no future plans as yet.

ANOTHER PIONEER CALLED BY DEATH

John T. Oldham Dead After Illness of Nearly Two Years

Charlevoix is called upon to mourn the loss of another pioneer of this region by the death of John T. Oldham, who died at his home here last Wednesday forenoon, after an illness lasting over a year and a half.

Deceased was born at London, England, July 16, 1853. He lived there until nine years of age, moving with his parents to Boutheful, Canada, where he resided for about ten years. From Boutheful the family moved to Bracebridge, Canada, where Mr. Oldham wus united in marriage to Anna M. Pickering.

Mr. and Mrs. Oldham left Bracebridge about thirty years ago, moving onto a farm near Barnard, making their home there until they took up their residence in Charlevoix. Seven children were born to this union, six of whom survive, viz: George, of Hibbing, Minn.; John H., of Detroit; Mrs. E. H. Carpenter of Saginaw; William of Kent City; Lacy W. of Flint; and Mrs. E. J. Smith of Charlevoix, all of whom were present at the funeral. A son, Horatio, is deceased.

Funeral services were held from the Methodist church last Saturday forenoon, September 25th, Rev. C. E. Pollock officiating. Interment at Brookside.

Mr. Oldham was a staunch and faithful member of the Methodist church and died fully trusting the Lord. He was a man of sterling character and leaves a host of friends who will mourn his departure.

RESORT OWNERS ARE ORGANIZING

First Meeting Is Called for Manistee, October 5

With a view toward safeguarding and promoting their interests, Western Michigan resort property owners are organizing and will meet in Manistee, October 5, in conjunction with the annual gathering of the Michigan Tourist and Resort association.

John G. Emery, of Grand Rapids, has been named as temporary president of the western state owners. A. M. Larson, of Muskegon, has been selected as vice-president, and Lee Chamberlain, Grund Rapids, secretary-treasurer.

Directors are:

John C. Quinlan, Petoskey; Arthur Bergeon, Charlevoix; Chas. Carver, Elk Rapids; Frank James, Traverse City; George Johnson, Empire; Clyde Smith, Beulah; Tom Reed, Shelby; Clay F. Olmstead, Manistee; A. M. Larson, Muskegon; Isaac Kouw, Holland, and Lee Chamberlain, Grand Rapids.

All western Michigan counties will be represented in the new organization.

BRIDGE-DINNER PARTY AN ATTRACTIVE AFFAIR

Cooper Home Scene of Party in Honor of Visiting Relatives

One of the most attractive affairs ever held in Charlevoix, was the bridge-dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. Clinton G. Cooper, and Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Niver of Boyne City, at the home of the former last Saturday evening. The honor guests were Mr. and Mrs. Theo. Kirchner of Saginaw, and Mr. and Mrs. T. E. Kirchener of Detroit.

The beautiful north side home of Mr. and Mrs. Cooper was resplendent in a profusion of autumn flowers. The dining room from which a five course buffet dinner was served, was most artistically arranged in huge boquets and tall lighted tapers. Covers were laid for thirty-two.

The out-of-town guests included, besides the honor guests, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Barden, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Dillworth, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Naylor, Mr. and Mrs. Lyle Tooley, Dr. and Mrs. W. M. Boylan, and Mrs. Gerard, all of Boyne City.

At bridge, the first honors fell to Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bridge, the second going to Dr. and Mrs. W. W. Mitchell, while Mr. and Mrs. Gaskin captured the third.

October is Rally Month for all church activities.

"Dust and Divinity" second sermon in the Christian Cardinal series, 10:30 a. m. next Sunday.

"The City Four-square," sermon lecture to emphasize an unusual and important truth, 7:30 p. m. next Sunday. This will be a feature service, fine young people's chorus choir, choral songs, prayer song under the lighted cross and a good fellowship hour.

The Sunday school is rapidly growing in numbers and interest. Be sure to come on time for the hour is twelve o'clock sharp.

The Epworth League meets at 6:30 each Sunday evening now. The League room was nearly full of people last Sunday evening. A splendid hour is planned by the young people for next Sunday.

Prayer meeting calls at 7:30 each Thursday evening, and is being attended by good congregations. Young and older are always welcome. Each Thursday evening pastor presents in a brief address some pertinent phase of the Sunday school lesson for the following Sunday. Teachers find this profitable.

CLEANING HOUSE DESTROYED BY BAD FIRE

Frame Building Containing Naptha Burned at Fast Pace

Fire of unknown origin, which started at about 11:45 Tuesday forenoon, completely destroyed the cleaning shed in the rear of Cartier's tailor shop.

The building contained quite a large amount of naptha, used for cleaning purposes, and the fire, when started, gained such proportions in a very few minutes that it was almost impossible to save the structure. Speedy work on the part of the department saved the dancing pavilion nearby, which was only scorched.

Very little clothing was lost in the fire, although Mr. Cartier's loss on the machinery contained in the building will be considerable.

Mrs. Leon Miler of Detroit, will entertain in the I. O. O. F. Temple, Thursday, October 7. Mrs. Miler comes highly recommended as an elocutionist. Price 25c.—Adv. 39t1

SAVE CHILDREN FROM AUTOMOBILE

SAFETY CAMPAIGN TO BE STARTED IN SCHOOLS

Traffic Injuries and Death Expected to be Eliminated by State wide Movement

For the safegaarding of the children of Charlevoix and adjacent rural district, Dewey J. Pearson of the state department of public safety, whose headquarters is at Cheboygan, has started a Charlevoix campaign to safeguard the lives of children who seemingly have no fear of the passing automobile.

Mr. Penrson will start first in the county schools along the great automobile trunk lines, where the speed and danger is greatest. The campnign is state-wide, and the Charlevoix county effort is only a small part of the attempt to conserve the lives of the little folks who have not reached the years of discretion. Every school in Michigan will be visited and talks given. Penrsall will cover Charlevoix county, and after completing his rural work he will talk in Charlevoix city schools.

Only a week or so ago a little four year old Petoskey tot was killed by a prominent Chicago businessman who was immedintely exonerated. The driver was moving at a moderate speed when the child ran into his car. Not long ago a certain young man in a neighboring city ran out of his school yard with a football under his arm. He was ran down and that he was not killed was mirnculous. We have a case right here at home. Recall the Nowland incident, south of the Belvedere grounds. A little six year old Detroit girl had her dinner and wanted an ice cream cone. Her mother gave her a nickle and she started skipping across the road to the candy store. But she only got half way across when a big truck struck her. They picked her up dead and the nickle laid in her fist. In each of these instances had the child looked both ways in the street before they started across, they would be happily playing about today.

The intent of this campaign is to instill in the minds of children the thoughts of safety, and warn them against the sad results of thoughtlessness and carelessness. When this is accomplished accidents of every nature will de lessened.

In each school one or more of the reliable boys will be appointed a junior state policeman with full authority to act in emergency cases. Safety patrol will be formed and the children asked to make a safety pledge. Medals will be awarded to those who have the best record in living up to the pledge taken.

The talks by Pearson will not occupy over fifteen minates each and he will also discuss hooking rides, walking on the wrong side of the bighway and other vital matters.

RECEPTION GIVEN FRIDAY FOR TEACHERS

Meeting Under Auspices of W. C. T. U. Largely Attended

A community reception for our publie school teachers was held at the Methodist church last Friday evening under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperanee Union and was attended by a goodly number.

A short program was presented at which Dr. Burns presided. Mrs. Saltonstall made the address of welcome. Mrs. Archie Swinton played an instrumental solo and Miss Carey sang "How Do You Do, How Are You," making a happy hit at the superintendent and faculty.

The pastors and several of the school men spoke on the value of Parent-Teacher meetings, expressing the wish that a Parent-Teacher association might be organized here. Following the program light refreshments were served.

The committee in charge, viz; Mrs. Geo. Kelderhouse, Mrs. Geo. Russell, Mrs. Cecil Pollock, Mrs. B. G. Mattson and Mrs. E. C. Sterrit did everything possible to make the evening a pleasant one, and the only thing to be regretted was that more did not avail themselves of the privilege to meet the guests of honor.

On account of so many school children needing glasses, Dr. J. Leahy the Optometrist will be at the Hotel Charlevoix, Monday, October 11.—Adv. 40t1.

EXTENDS WELCOME TO CHARLEVOIX FOLKS

Former Charlevoix Resident Enjoys Their Visit

In a letter from Mrs. Irene Gage Chapel, a former resident of Charlevoix, she states that Charlevoix people visiting the west are most welcome at her home. She says, "tell them to visit me and I will make their stay as enjoyable as possible." We are always glad to hear from our former towns-people, and below is published u part of Mrs. Chapel's letter for the benefit of those who knew the family while they were residents here:

Montrose, Sept. 27

Editor Charlevoix Courier:—We are about to move to 420 S. Lincoln street, Glendale, Calif., so will you please change our address to this point? I have been incapacitated by illness for some time, due to a nervous breakdown, but I have been very slowly improving and am much better at present, and hope to be as well as usual before many months.

"I often think of the old familiar faces in Charlevoix and wish I might see them all again. I hope I may some time be able to go back on a visit. Once in a while we see old friends out here—Mrs. Paddock and Mrs. Mayne last winter—and am always so pleased to hear of all friends and acquaintances. I enjoy keeping up with the town news through the Courier, exept that there are so many funerals of people I used to know.

"My son, Franklin, has been with the Western Electric Co. for nearly five years (ever since he graduated in mechanical engineering). He enjoys his work and is a stendy dependable boy and a great comfort to me.

"We will be very glad to see any of the old friends or acquaintances who are out here this winter, and wish you all the grentest prosperity in every way."

NEW FIRM UNDER NAME OF BLOCK & SIMMONS

Will Handle Farm Implements, Oakland, Pontiac, Chevrolet Cars

Henry Block, for the past few years located in the Lakeway Garnge, corner Antrim and State, has bought an interest in the firm of Cooper & Simmons, which will be now known as Block & Simmons.

The new firm will be local agents for the Oakland, Pontiac and Chevrolet automobiles, along with the line of International Harvester Co. and John Deer farm implements handled for years by Cooper & Simmons. Messrs. Block and Simmons returned the first of this week from Pontiac with new Oakland and Pontiac cars for their salesroom. Offices of the new firm will be in the same location as formerly and their display room will be in the same building.

Mr. Block will move his repair department into tha garage building immediately east of the office and continue business in that location.

CHARLEVOIX LOST AT EAST JORDAN

THIRD QUARTER TOUCHDOWN SPELLS DEFEAT

Locals Take on Traverse City Here Saturday—Summary of Other Northern Games

Charlevoix high school dropped her third game of the season to East Jordan last Saturday afternoon, at East Jordan, by the narrow margin of 6-0, a touchdown in the third quarter counting the winning points.

East Jordan, although a lighter team, made up for their lack of weight by consistent playing and a strong offense. As was the case last year, Charlevoix plays a strong defensive game, but lack the punch to put the ball over on the offense. Johnny Williams starred for locals, putting up a fine brand of defensive work.

This week, in preparation for the Traverse City game, which will be played here on Saturday at 2:00 p. m., Coach (Tex) Buchen is drilling his men on fundementals and signals and hopes that, with three game's experience behind them, the locals will open up with a strong offense and give the spectators something to get excited about.

Results of football games in other northern Michigan towns sum up as follows:

Petoskey high school seems to have a slight edge in the race for the northern Michigan championship by her overwhelming defeat of the husky Manceiona eleven at Petoskey, by a score of 63 to 0. Petoskey carried the ball 447 ynrds from scrimmage while Mancelona carried the pigskin 11 yards. Petoskey did not have to punt throughout the entire game and made touchdowns at will, scoring in every period.

Harbor Springs showed real strength in her 6-0 defeat of Boyne City at Harbor Springs. Boyne forced the victors all through the game and had the ball within scoring distance on many instances. Harbor put up a good brand of defense and this feature probnbly won the game for them. Harhor plays Petoskey next Saturday and the outcome of the game is being watched with interest.

Cadillac high school, also in the field for the northern Michigan championship, was defeated by Grand Rapids Catholic Central by the score of 26 to 0, and although defeated, showed real strength. Traverse City also went down to defeat in the hands of Bay City, 14 to 0, but had the edge on the Bay City outfit during the first three quarters of the game.

Another formidable foe looms up from the upper peninsula. Soo ran wild over Munising last Saturday, winning 51 to 7. Soo play at Petoskey in two weeks.

The Baptist Ladies' Aid will serve a chicken pie supper at the Baptist church Wednesday evening, October 13th, from 5:30 until all are served. Price 35c and 50c.—Adv. 40-t1.

STATE SCHOOL HEAD ACCUSED

GOVERNOR AFTER SCALP OF OFFENDING OFFICIALS

Thomas E. Johnson is Cited by Groesbeck for Hearing on Malfeasance Charge

Thomas E. Johnson, state supenintendant of public instruction, was cited by Gov. Alex J. Groesbeck Saturday afternoon for hearing Oct. 6 on charge of corrupt conduct, malfeasance in office and wilful neglect of duty. If the charges are sustained he is subject to removal from office by the governor.

The charges against Johnson are brought by Gov. Groesheck under the authority granted by Section 7 of article 9 of the State Constitution, which reads as follows:

"The Governor shall have power and it shall be his duty, except at such times as the legislature may be in session, to examine into the condition and administration of any public officer, elective or appointive; to remove from office for gross neglect of duty or for currupt conduct in office, or any other misfeasance or malfeasance therein, nny elective or appointive state officer, except legislative or judicial, and the cause of such removal to the legislature at its next session.

The charges against Johnson and the citation to appenr for hearing were placed in the hands of Inspector I. H. Marmon, of the State Police for service.

The henring is scheduled to take place in the executive offices at Lansing, to-day; beginning at 10 a. m., at which time Gov. Groesbeck will proceed to the examination of witnesses and Johnson will have an opportunity to offer a defense.

The specifications of the charges are detailed by Leonard T. Hands, state insurance commissioner, who has made an investigation of Johnson's connection with the Michigan Surety Co., a company engaged in the writing of bonds, insurance and sureties. In addition it is charged that Mr. Johnson "has unlawfully and corruptly appropriated to his own use, certnin moneys ander the claim and guise of sularies," from funds appropriated for state agricultural use by the federal government.

Johnson's salary as superintendent of public instruction, the charges point out is $5,000 a year, "which also embraces and includes general supervision of all educational institutions and education wihtin the state of Michigan." and that he "is not and has not been entitled to nny additional or furthur compensation for duties formed by him as superintendent of public instruction or as ex-officio member of various educational boards," etc.

Hands charges that Johnson "unlawfully and corruptly appropriated to his own use" certain federal money appropriated by congress for the support and control of instruction in agriculture, trades and industries.

PIONEER OF MARION TOWNSHIP IS DEAD

Was 88 Years Old, and Had Lived in This Vicinity 47 Years

Mrs. Edwin Cook, a resident of this vicinity for the past 47 years, died Sunday, September 10th, at the home of her son, James Cook, of Marion Center, at the advanced age of 88 years, 10 months and 7 days.

Barbara Law was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, on November 23, 1837. When eleven years of age she, with her mother and half brother and sister, crossed the ocean in a sailing vessel, it taking 7 weeks to make the trip, arriving at Quebec, Canada.

In 1861 she was united in marriage to Edwin Cook of Canada, and in the year 1879 the couple came to Charlevoix, where she had since lived. To this union were born five children, Lucy, Ellen, (deceased), James, Edwin, and Jennie. Both she and her husband were life-long members of the Presbyterian church of Fergus, Canada.

Funeral services were held from the home of her son, James, and from the Barnard church on Saturday afternoon, Rev. Herman Burns officiating. Interment in the Barnard cemetery.

GET HUGE FISH IN NETS NEAR CROSS VILLAGE

Henry Sullivan Captures Sturgeon Weighing 120 Pounds

Fishermen at Cross Village Sunday were stricken almost helpless for a second or so when they discovered a monster fish tearing their net to pieces, and for a moment thought the great Petoskey sea monster had returned to life. However they quickly overcame their fright and proceeded to capture a ginnt Lake Michigan rock sturgeon.

The fish measured six and one-half feet long and weighed one hundred and twenty pounds. It was taken by Henry Sullivan, Cross Village fisherman, in his pond net.

Sullivan express the belief that the finny fighter was the same fellow caught in the net a week ago. On this occasion he quickly tore a hole through the side of the enclosure and escaped. Sunday he ran into a stronger bit of net and was quickly dispatched to the "happy fishes' feeding ground."—Petoskey Evening News.

CHARLEVOIX BAND TO REORGANIZE

M. L. Garland of Petoskey Engaged as Leader

The Charlevoix City Band will meet for re-organization in the court room on Monday evening of next week. M. L. Garland of Petoskey has been engnged as leader. Mr. Garland comes well recommended and is an nble musical director.

For several years he acted in the capacity of director of the Petoskey City band, and prior to this, was connected with the bands at Harbor Springs, Boyne City and Central Lake.

Beginners are requested to see W. C. Bellinger, secretary and treasurer of the organization, at once, should they desire to affiliate themselves with the local hand.

The Charlevoix band has accomplished a great deal during the past year, and with a new leader and additional players, we should have a musical organization second to none in northern Michigan.

BAPTISTS HELD ANNUAL MEETING

GAVE REPORTS FOR YEAR AND ELECTED NEW OFFICERS

Meeting Was Largely Attended and Talks by Dr. Armstrong and Rev. Ross Were Most Impressive.

The annanl meeting of the Baptist church was held Monday evening in the basement parlors and was begun by the ladies serving a most bountiful supper. Some said that it was the largest business meeting in point of attendance in the history of the organization and others used superlatives in discribing the supper.

After all were served the pastor called the meeting to order and introduced the chorister, Harker Kirby who sang, "Oh, Love that would not let me go" to the delight of all. Then Dr. Armstrong was introduced to tell about his trip to Florida and Cuba. All were delighted with this word picture and regreted when he concladed the story of his trip. It was informing and so well told that several said they had learned more about the "land of flowers" than they had ever known before.

Then Rev. W. S. Ross, pastor of the Parr Memorial church of Petoskey, was introduced and gave a most impressive talk of the inspirational kind, chosing for his theme the slogan "Straight Ahead" making everybody sense the tnsk of the church, and that that task can best be accomplished by a straight course, turning neither to the right nor to the left until the trophies are laid at the Master's feet.

Reports were then called for, and these reports showed that the church had raised for all departments of its work, including the allowance contributed by the state convention, not far from three thousand dollars, a result that would have been incredible a few years ago. The membership had had some growth, but the best growth was in the fellowship and deepened spiritual life.

The following officers were elected: M. K. Chew and Mrs. Rose Kibbie, trustees for three years; Charles Carey, Eugene Burgess and Delbert Ingalls, deacons for two years; Mrs. Louise Smith, church elerk; Ernest Peaslee, church treasurer; Mrs. Harker Kirby, Sunday school supt.; Harker Kirby, chorister for church and Sunday school; Ida Ingalls, Pearl Smith and Ty Kirby, pianists.

The pastor was voted n two-week's vacation to begin at once and thus enable him to attend the state convention, which meets at Adrian Oct. 18th to 23rd, where he is to preach the annual sermon.

TWO CLASSES WON STAR ATTENDANCE BANNERS

Congregational S. S. Classes Held Rally Program

The Congregational Sunday school had for its slogan during September: "Every member of our class present Rally Day," but only two classes, viz: the Willing Workers and Blue Birds, reached the goal and received the star attendaneo banners. Most of the others lacked only one or two, so the sessions of the school at twelve o'clock was well attended.

At five o'clock, a rally program was rendered by the achool cloning with a pageant entitled "To whom shall we go." Thirty-four members of the school participnted in the the pageant, several from each department appealing to the principal character—the Church—voicing tha needs of their group.

substitutes if you seek the famous Quaker flavor

THE point to remember when buying breakfast oats is that only Quaker Oats have the rich Quaker flavor that you want.

One package of oats without that flavor may spoil your breakfasts for a week.

The price you pay is the same. Thus "trying" a substitute is a folly. Quaker flavor is the result of some 50 years milling experience. No other oats has it. Quaker milling, too, retains much of the "bulk" of oats. And that makes laxatives less often needed.

Get Quick Quaker, which cooks in 3 to 5 minutes, or regular Quaker Oats as you have always known.

"Buster" Collier Has Found Screen Success a Meteor

William Collier, Jr., who plays a footsteps, Collier both wrote and ture, "The Lucky Lady," a Raoul Walsh production, can boast a more meteoric career than almost any other screen player in the industry today.

Starting to follow his father's footsteps, Collier both wrote and played in a number of legitimate stage productions after his graduation from college. Since his entrance in pictures just a few years ago he has appeared in several of the biggest productions made by Paramount. His part as the prodigal son in "The Wanderer," also directed by Raoul Walsh, firmly established him as one of the few really great leading men of the present day.

In "The Lucky Lady," which comes to the Palace on Oct 12-13, an original story by Robert E. Sherwood and Bertram Bloch, he plays the part of a wealthy American tourist who meets and falls in love with the Princess of San Guido. Other featured players in the cast are Greta Nissen, Lionel Barrymore and Marc MacDermott.

"Lydia," said her father abruptly, "You're a big girl now. You asked for skates and a sled for Christmas. My child, I don't see how you children are going to have anything extra for Christmas, except perhaps a little candy and an orange. That note with Marshall comes due in January. By standing Levine off on the rent, I can rake and scrape the interest together. It's hopeless for me even to consider meeting the note. What Marshall will do, I don't know. If I could ever get on my feet—with the garden. But on a dollar and a half a day, I swan—"

"No Christmas at all?" quavered Lydia. "Won't we even hang up our stockings?"

"If you'll be contented just to put a little candy in them. Come, Lydia, you're too big to hang up your stocking, anyhow."

Lydia left her father and walked over to the window. She pressed her face against the pane and looked back to the lake. As she looked, the weight on her chest lifted. The trembling in her hands that always came with the mention of money, lessened. The child, even as early as this, had the greatest gift that life bestows, the power of deriving solace from sky and hill and sweep of water.

"Anyhow," she said to her father, "I've still got something to look forward to. I've got the doll house to give baby, and Mr. Levine always gives me a book for Christmas."

"That's a good girl!" Amos gave a relieved sigh, then went on with his brooding over his unlighted pipe.

And after all, this Christmas proved to be one of the high spots of Lydia's life. She had a joyous 24th. All the morning she spent in the woods on the Norton farm with her sled, cutting pine boughs. As she trudged back through the farmyard, Billy Norton called to her.

"Oh, Lydia!"

Lydia stopped her sled against a drift and waited for Billy to cross the farmyard. He was a large, awkward boy several years older than Lydia. He seemed a very homely sort of person to her, yet she liked his face. He was as fair as Kent was dark. Kent's features were regular and clean-cut. Billy's were rough hewn and irregular, and his hair and lashes were straight and blond.

What Lydia could not at this time appreciate was the fact that Billy's gray eyes were remarkable in the clarity and steadiness of their gaze, that his square jaw and mobile mouth were full of fine promise for his manhood and that even at sixteen the framework of his great body was magnificent.

He never had paid any attention to Lydia before and she was bashful toward the older boys.

"Say, Lydia, want a brace of ducks? A lot of them settled at Warm Springs last night and I've got more than I can use."

He leaned his gun against the fence and began to separate two birds from the bunch hanging over his shoulder. Lydia began to breathe quickly. The Dudleys could not afford a special Christmas dinner.

"I—I don't know how I could pay you, Bill—"

"Who wants pay?" asked Bill, indignantly.

"I dasn't take anything without paying for it," returned Lydia, her eyes still on the ducks. "But I'd—I'd rather have those than a ship."

Billy's clear gaze wandered from Lydia's thin little face to her patched mittens and back again.

"Won't your father let you?" he asked.

"I won't let myself," replied the little girl.

"Oh!" said Billy, his gray eyes deepening. "Well, let me have the evergreens and you go back for some more. It'll save me getting ma here."

With one thrust of her foot Lydia shoved the fragrant pile of boughs into the snow. She tied the brace of duck to the sled and started back toward the wood, then paused and looked back at Billy.

"Thank you a hundred times," she called.

"It was a business deal. No thanks needed," he replied.

Lydia nodded and trudged off. The boy stood for a moment looking at the little figure, then he started after her.

"Lydia, I'll get that load of pines for you."

She tossed a vivid smile over her shoulder. "You will not. It's a business deal."

And Billy turned back reluctantly toward the barn.

In an hour Lydia was panting up the steps into the kitchen. Lizzie's joy was even more extreme than Lydia's. She thawed the ducks out and dressed them, after dinner, with the two children standing so close as at times seriously to impede progress.

"I'm lucky," said Lydia. "There isn't anybody luckier than I am or has better things happen to 'em than I do. Won't daddy be glad!"

Amos was glad. Plodding sadly home, he was greeted by three glowing faces in the open door as soon as his foot sounded on the porch. The base burner in the living-room was clear and glowing. The dining-room was fragrant with pine. He was not allowed to take off his overcoat, but was towed to the kitchen where the two birds, trussed and stuffed for the baking, were set forth on the table.

"I got 'em!" shouted Lydia. "I got 'em off Billy Norton for a load of pine. Christmas present for you, daddy, from yours truly. Lydia!" She seized the baby's hands and the two did a dance around Amos, shouting, "Christmas present! Christmas present!" at the top of their lungs.

"Well! Well!" exclaimed Amos. "Isn't that fine! If Levine comes out tomorrow we can ask him to dinner, after all. Can't we, Lizzie?"

"You bet we can!" said Lizzie. "And look at this. I was going to keep it for a surprise. I made it by your wife's recipe."

She held an open Mason jar under Amos' nose.

"Mince meat!" he exclaimed. "Why, Lizzie, where'd you get the makings?"

"Oh, a bit here and a bit there for the last two months. Ain't it grand?" offering a smell to each of the children, who sniffed ecstatically.

When the baby was safely asleep, Lydia appeared with two stockings which she hung on chair backs by the stove in the living room.

"I'm putting them up to hold the candy," she explained to her father, suggestively.

He rose obediently and produced half a dozen oranges and a bag of candy.

"Oh, that's gorgeous," cried Lydia, whose spirits tonight were not to be quenched. She brought in the doll house.

"See, daddy," she said with the pride of the master builder. "I colored it with walnut juice. And I found the wall paper in the attic."

Amos got down on his knees and examined the tiny rooms and the cigar box furniture. He chuckled delightedly. "I swan," he said, "if Patience doesn't want it you can give it to me!"

"I'm going to let Lizzie put the candy in the stockings," mused Lydia, "then I'll have that to look forward to. I'm going to bed right now, so morning will come sooner."

Alone with the stockings, into which Lizzie put the candy and oranges, Amos sat long, staring at the base burner. Something of the urgent joy and beauty of the Eve touched him, for he finally rose and said:

"Well, I've got two fine children, anyhow." Then he filled up the stoves for the night and went to bed.

CHAPTER IV

The Ravished Nest

It would be difficult to say which enjoyed the doll house more, Lydia or Patience. It would be difficult to say which one was the more touched, Lizzie or Amos by the package each found on the breakfast table. Amos unwrapped his to find therein a pipe tray fashioned from cigar box wood and stained with Lydia's walnut dye. Lizzie's gift was a flat black pincushion, with "Lizzie, with love from Lydia," embroidered crazily on it in red. Lydia and Patience each wore pinned to her dress a cotton handkerchief, Lizzie's gift.

John Levine appeared at noon, laden like a pack horse. This was his great opportunity during the year to do things for the Dudley children and he took full advantage of the moment. Books for Lydia, little toys for the baby, a pipe for Amos, a woolen dress pattern for Lizzie, a blue serge suit for Lydia, a fur hood for Patience.

John's thin, sallow face glowed, his black eyes gleamed as he watched the children unwrap the packages. In the midst of the excitement, Lydia shrieked:

"My ducks! My ducks!" and bolted for the kitchen.

"The pie!" cried Lizzie, panting after her.

"Don't tell me they're spoiled!" groaned Amos, as with John and the baby, he followed into the kitchen.

"Safe!" shouted Lydia, on her knees before the oven. "Just the pope's nose is scorched: The pie is perfect."

"Let's eat before anything else happens," said Amos, nervously.

"Lord!" said John Levine, "who'd miss spending Christmas where there are children? I'd a gotten out here today if I'd had to come barefooted."

The dinner was eaten and pronounced perfect. The gifts were readmired. John Levine, with Lydia and Florence Dombey on his lap, Amos with the drowsy little Patience in his arms, and Lizzie, her tired hands folded across her comfortable stomach, sat round the base burner while the wind rose outside and the boom of the ice-locked lake filled the room from time to time.

"Fearful cold when the ice cracks that way," said Amos.

"The owl, for all his feathers was a-cold," murmured Lydia.

"Where'd you get that and what's the rest of it?" asked Levine.

"Selected Gems," replied Lydia. "It's a girl's poem. Gosh, I've been happy today! Daddy, you thought we'd have an awful poor Christmas, didn't you? Poor old daddy! Why, I've just felt all day as if my heart was on tiptoes."

It had indeed been a high day for the child. Perhaps she remembered it for years after as one of her perfect days, because of the heartbreaking days that followed.

For little Patience for the first time in her tiny life was taken ill. For three or four days after Christmas she was feverish and cross with a hoarse cold. When Amos came home the fourth night, he thought she had the croup and sent Lydia pelting through the darkness for the dairy farmer's wife. Mrs. Norton, the mother of Billy, was not long in coming to a decision.

"'Tain't regular croup. You go after the doctor, Mr. Dudley."

Patience, frightened by her difficult breathing, would let no one but Lydia touch her. Under Mrs. Norton's supervision, she packed the baby in hot water bottles while Lizzie heated water and stoked the fires till the stove doors glowed red.

Amos came back with the doctor about nine o'clock. Patience was in a stupor. The doctor sent Lydia away while he made his examination. The child clenched her fists and walked up and down the living-room, cheeks scarlet, eyes blazing. Suddenly she dropped on her knees by the window and lifted her clasped hands to the stars.

"God! God, up there!" she called. "If you let her die, I'll never pray to you again! Never! I warned You when You let mother die!"

She remained a moment on her knees, staring at the stars while fragments of Sunday school lore flashed through her mind. "Our Father who art in heaven," she said. "No, that won't do. Suffer little children to come unto me. Oh, no, no."

The door opened and Lizzie came out, tears running down her cheeks. Lydia flew to her.

"They say I got to tell you. Diphtheritic croup—her lungs is full—no hope."

Lydia struck the kind old hand from her shoulder and dashed out of the house. She ran through the snow to a giant pine by the gate and beat her fists against it for how long she did not know. Pain in her bruised hands and the intense cold finally brought her to her senses. A self-control that was partly inherent and partly the result of too early knowledge of grief came to her rescue. With a long sigh, she walked steadily into the house and into the room where the baby sister lay in a stupor, breathing stertorously.

The doctor and Amos were there. Mrs. Norton was now soothing Lizzie in the kitchen, now obeying the doctor's orders. Amos did not stir from his chair by the bed, nor speak a word, all that night. The doctor was in his shirt sleeves, prepared to fight as best he could.

"Go out, Lydia," said Doctor Fulton, quietly.

"She'll want me," replied the child.

"She's in a stupor and won't miss you, Lydia. She is not suffering at all. Now, I want you to go to bed like a good girl."

"I won't," said Lydia, quietly.

"Lydia," the doctor went on, as if he were talking to a grown person, "all your life you will be grateful to me, if I make you obey me now. I know those wild nerves of yours, too much and too early controlled. Lydia, go to bed!"

Not because she feared him but because some knowledge beyond her years told her of his wisdom, Lydia turned, found Florence Dombey in the living room and with her and a blanket, crept under her father's bed, into the farthest corner where she lay wide-eyed until dawn. Someone closed the door into the room then, and shortly, she fell asleep.

• • • • • • •

In three days, the like of which are the longest, the shortest days of life, the house had returned to the remnant of its old routine. The place had been fumigated. Lydia had placed in her bedroom everything that had belonged to the baby, had locked the door and had moved herself into Lizzie's room. Amos departed before dawn as usual with his dinner pail, stumbling like an old man, over the road.

The quarantine sign was on the house and no one but the undertaker, the doctor, Mrs. Norton and John Levine had been allowed to come to see the stricken little family, excepting the minister.

Lydia and Lizzie put in the morning cleaning the cottage. Never since they had lived in it had the little house been so spick and span. At noon, they sat down to lunch in a splendor of cleanliness that made the place seem stranger than ever to them both. Neither talked much. At intervals, tears ran down old Lizzie's wrinkled cheeks and Lydia looked at her wonderingly. Lydia had not shed a tear. But all the time her cheeks were scarlet, her hands were cold and trembled and her stomach ached.

"You must eat, childie. You haven't eat enough to keep a bird alive since—since—"

There was a bang on the door, and Lizzie trundled over to open it.

"For the Lord's sake, Kent!"

Kent it was, big and rosy with his skates over his shoulders. He walked into the living room deliberately.

"Hello, Lydia," he said, "I came out to see your Christmas presents."

Lydia clasped her hands. "Oh, Kent, I'm so glad! But you can't stay! We're quarantined."

Keep Eliminative System Active

Good Health Requires Good Elimination

ONE can't feel well when there is a retention of poisonous waste in the blood. This is called a toxic condition, and is apt to make one tired, dull and languid. Other symptoms are sometimes toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Many people have learned the value of Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, when the kidneys seem functionally inactive. Everywhere one finds enthusiastic Doan's users. Ask your neighbor!

THINK IT OVER!

a philosopher-financier said, "It is better to sleep on 4 per cent interest than to lie awake on 6 per cent."

There are any number of mining stocks, rubber plantation development companies, fake oil concerns and town-site propositions that will be only too willing to take your money and PROMISE six, eight or ten per cent interest for the use of it.

But remember this! Your money in our savings department earns 4 per cent. Sure. It is here today, tomorrow—or whenever you want it. Better take 4 per cent at home and sleep well.

WILL BE GREAT ADDITION TO CARLEVOIX

Work Already Started on Beautiful Oldswood Lodge

The Oldswood Lodge is to be built on Oldswood Point, the property recently purchased by R. E. Olds. This is located about one and n half miles east of Charlevoix, Michigan, on the Petoskey Road. The property consists of about one hundred and fifty acres extending from the concrete road down about one mile to the beautiful Lake Charlevoix. It is bounded on the east by Oyster Bay and on the west by Pine Point Bay. The greater portion of the land is high and well timbered with maple, white birch, pine and cedar.

Plans now being drawn by the Warren Holmes - Powers Company, Lansing architects, provide for an exterior of vertically pieced 6" x 6" timbers and stucco suggesting the English half timber work and harmonizing with the surroundings of evergreens.

This spacous summer lodge will measure one hundred and five feet long and sixty-nine feet wide. The interior centers about the generous living room forty feet by thirty-two feet with a large fireplace and exposed roof trusses. At either side of the fireplace stairways reach a balcony located at the end of the living room and extending as a corridor to provide access to the seventeen bedrooms. The thirty-six feet by eighteen feet dining room, library bath rooms and servants' quarters complete the excellent provisions to be included in this fine cottage.

VALVE-IN-HEAD Buick MOTOR CARS

A-10-10

THE motor car industry was startled when Buick presented the new Buick with an engine vibrationless beyond belief.

If you have driven this great new car, with this remarkable engine, you know why.

Its fluid smoothness makes other motor cars seem rough, harsh, noisy.

People who have driven Buicks for years and people who have owned much more expensive cars, are captivated by the luxury of this one.

EDITORIALS

THE PEDDLER

The days when the "Frost is on the pumukin," will soon be with us; the mellow Octoher days when the final harvests of the yenr are being garnered on the farms, whose evenings are occupied by the husbandman who sits down to total up the tribute Mother Earth has rendered unto him out of her bountiful share.

But the farmer is not the only individual that looks forward to this season of the year as his harvest; there is another—the peddler—who comes into every community exacting his toll and helping to delay that day of real community progress. He comes smiling and smirking, bowing and scraping, and under the hypnotic spell of his blandishments many a dollar is taken out of the home that should have found its way into the coffers of the home town merchant, where better values and better service can invnrably be found.

Michigan ia still largely an agricultural state, and as such ready money is generally more in evidence during this period of the year thnn at any other time during the twelve months. That's why the tribe of doorbell ringers flourish in greater nnmbers now than at any other time and we warn you to scan well every proposition they have to offer if you will save yourself many a good, hard lost later on. Your home town merchant is always fair—he is where you can find him every day during the entire year—he is alwnys ready to make good on every sale that is not satisfactory to the customer. You can't do this with the peddler, who is here to-day and gone tomorrow, and who has no concern in your welfare nfter he has made a sale.

I'an to bring your family and friends to the annual meeting of the Charlevoix Co-Ops. Assn., Friday, Oct. 15, at Marion Center Grange Hall.—Adv. 40-t2.

FAKE STOCK SELLERS

If there is any one class of white collar bandits that should be studiously avoided it is the fake stock seller, whose trail is continually strewn with tales of blasted hopes, ruined lives and financial death. The fake stock salesman is the lowest of all breed thnt continually prcys upon the people. He is not even good sport enough to confine his operations to those of business judgement, but seeks out the widow with a small legaey or old people who have lnid hy a little competency to protect them during the evening of life.

He is generally the product of the large city, going about with an air of sophistication and worldly mein that seems to inspire confidence and allow them to easily get into the good graee of their intended victim. Ilis is the oily story of the big interest returns that lie at the end of the rainbow that he pictures. Ilis victims are led to the top of a mountain of promises and there shown the financial independence that is to be theirs literally for the nsking. Not even once in a hundred times does their story of a new El Dorado turn out to be true. Old men and women widows with little children sob out their pitiful story of the trust they placed in such schemes. There is only one safe way to invest your money, and that is: CONSULT YOUR BANKER FIRST.

Cold weather driving requires a good battery. If you have a Willard you will have no trouble. Take your battery trouble to Brown Battery Station.—Adv. 40tf.

FIRE PREVENTION WEEK

"Fire Prevention Week" has been set for Ostober 3-9. The nation's fire loss for 1925 was $562,751,466, according to figures just made available by the National Board of Fire Underwriters, the country's authority on the matter.

This is a horrible priee to pay, most of which is for carlessness. Not only does danger lurk in the cigarette or cigar thrown earelessly away, the box of matches left where the children can find them, the uncleaned chimney, the cluttered attic, but building construction is also to blame for much of this gigantie toll which has increased over four hundred million dollars since 1923, and which last year alone snuffed out twenty thousand lives.

Insurance experts, fire department officials and engineers tell us that 75 per cent of this enormous loss of life and treasure is preventable. During "Fire Prevention Week" see that you do your part in helping to remove the fire hazard around your property. Join with this community ni wiping out an evil that may bring us death and desolation when we least expect it.

IN CHARITY'S NAME

Wholesale soliciting of funds in the name of charity seems to have become a luerative occupation for a small army of workers under the direction of the nimble wits of the larger eities who find an easy living in preying upon the public.

The American people are generous; they respond quickly to every appeal for aid and the fact that the majority of us do not scan these nppeals very closely makes it possibla for a great many abuses to ereep in.

Many people reason they would rather be caught occasionally by unworthy appeals than to lay down a hard and fast rule of no donations and thereby turn down many a worthy cause. Thia community, and every other community, should have some point of clearance where the wheat could be separated from the chaff and those worthy of assistance given some letter of endorsement that will permit them to present their appeals for aid in a dignified and proper manner.

Charity, does and should begin at home. After we have taken care of all local needs we should see that whatever we have to spare after that goes into proper channels.

CROSS CROSSINGS CAUTIOUSLY

On October 1st the railroads of the country will eome to the end of a campaign whieh began May 1st to save lives at railroad crossings. In this cnmpaign they have had the active assistanee of safety councils and safety first organizations throughout the entire nntion, yet the toll of death at grade erossings was far greater than it should have been. Here we have this result in the face of this evident truth:

Almost All
Aecidents
Are Avoidable.

All railroad crossing aecidents are avoidable.

It costs a great deal to stop a trains—a train cannot be stopped quickly, and starts are slow and expensive, trains are on a sehedule and cannot stand the loss of time. Trains are about sixteen hundred times heavier and seventy or more times stronger than the average automobile; and trains inevitably win collision eontests at crossings. THE TRAIN CANNOT BE STOPPED—THE AUTOMOBILE MUST BE CURBED. Cross crossings cautiously is the one unfailing remedy for this useless throwing away of human life.

NEWSPAPER FAIRNESS

"It is my firm convietion that the press of the country is strong enough, independent enough, and influential enough, so that it should seek not to cater to a supposed low and degrnded public opinion, hut rather to crente n noble and inspired public opinion. It ought to work in harmony with a great purpose, revealing to the people the progress of the development of a Divine power. It should be the record of those mighty events which mark contemporary history. While it is necessary nt times to be critieal, yet it is to be remembered that eriticism is a barren operation, leaving no lasting results. True journalism must go far beyond this into the field of constructive effort. It is only in that direction that there will be found anything that is of lasting public benefit.—President Coolidge.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE PRIMARIES

This is a very interesting period in the political life of the country. Primaries are being held in various states and senators and congressmen, governors and other state officials are being selected by the respective parties as candidates for office in November. It is safe to say that the political issues for the November eampaign are all framed up. There is the tariff, prohibition, the trusts, the farmers' problem, the railroads, foreign relations and the myriad other national or local proposals of one or the other of the parties. It may be well to point out so far as the average man is concerned the great issues are our national political stability, the maintenance of our international honor and position and the prosperity of the country. Every citizen should be a fundamentalist on the preservation of the Constitution and the permanence of our prosperity. That is a good political creed.

DIGNITY OF LABOR

Work is the mission of mankind on this earth. A day is ever struggling forward, a day will arrive, in some approximnte degree, when he who has no work to do, by whatever name he may be called, will not find it good to show himself in our quarter of the solar system, but may go and look out elsewhere if there be nny idle planet discoverable. Let all honest workers rejoice that such law, the first of Nature, has been reeognized by them.—George Bernard Shaw.

THOUGHT PROVOKERS

We ran across the other day the kind of a reader we like.

He said that he didn't agree with our editorials on a good many aubjects.

Which prompted us to tell him that these editorials were not written to strike the unanimous sentiment of the larger number of our subscribers.

The purpose of the editorial eolumn of this newspaper is to set out certain ideas, certain lines of thought. What we say may be right, it may be wrong.

All we ask our readers to do is to consider what is said and eome to their own eonclusions. We seek to provoke a little thought along some important lines. If what we say directs you to some definite eonclusion we are pleased that our efforts have been of influence.

The gratifying thing is that so many subseribers read the editorials. We appreciate it.

HE SAVED HIS FILM

Ralph Earle, a motion picture photographer of Miami, Fla., was the first eyewitness of the hurricane to reach Washington, arriving at Bolling field by plane on his way to New York with an undeveloped film of the disaster. Earle made his home in the eastern part of Miami where the hurricane first struck and did the most damage. He was injured about the head and feet, and out of his belongings he managed to save only the clothes on his back and his camera and film. This is the second serious disaster Earle has witnessed, he having been in Japan when the earthnke took place a few years ago.

LYDIA of the Pines

by Honoré Willsie

(© by Frederick A. Stokes Co.) WNU Service

"What the seventeen thanuer-ougs do I enre," returned Kent, gruffly, looking away from Lydia's appealing eyes.

Lydia laughed, as she always did at Kent's astonishing oaths. At the sound of the laughter, old Lizzie gave a sigh as though some of her own tense nerves had relaxed.

"Now see here," growled Kent, "they've got no business to shut you up this way. You come out and skate for a while. We won't meet anybody at this end of the lake."

"Just the thing, quarantine or not!" exclaimed Lizzie, briskly. "And I'll cook a surprise for the two of you. Keep her out an hour, Kent."

Lydia silently got into overcoat and leggings and pulled on her Tam o'Shanter. She brought her skates from the kitchen and the two children made their way to the lake shore.

With unwonted consideration, Kent helped Lydia strap on her skates. Then the two started, hand in hand, up the lake. They skated well, as did most of the children of the community. The wind in their faces was bitter cold, making conversation difficult. Whether or not Kent was grateful for this, one could not say. He watched Lydia out of the tail of his eye and as the wind whipped the old red into her cheeks, he began to whistle. They had been going perhaps fifteen minutes when the little girl stumbled several times.

"What's the matter, Lyd?" asked Kent.

"I don't know," she panted. "I—I guess I'm tired."

"Tired already? Gosh! And you've always worn me out. Come on up to the shore, and I'll make a fire, so's you can rest."

Lydia, who always had scorned the thought of rest, while at play, followed meekly and stood in silence while Kent without removing his skates hobbled up the bank and pulled some dead branches to the shore. Shortly he had a bright blaze at her feet. He kicked the snow off a small log.

"Sit down—here where you get the warmth," he ordered, his voice as gruff as he could make it.

Lydia sat down obediently, her mittened hands clasping her knees. Kent stood staring at his little chum. He took in the faded blue tam, the outgrown coat, the red mittens, so badly mended, the leggings with patches on the knees. Then he eyed the heavy circles around her eyes and the droop to the mouth that was meant to be merry.

Kent was only a boy, but he was mature in spite of his heedless ways. Staring at the tragedy in Lydia's ravished little face, a sympathy for her pain as real as it was unwonted swept over him. Suddenly he dropped down beside her on the log and threw his boyish arms about her.

"I'm so doggone sorry for you, Lydia!" he whispered.

Lydia lifted startled eyes to his. Never before had Kent shown her the slightest affection. When she saw the sweetness and sympathy in his brown gaze:

"Oh, Kent," she whispered, "why did God let it happen! Why did He?" and she buried her face on his shoulder and began to sob. Softly at first, then with a rocking agony of tears.

Even a rabbit is wise in the matter of grief. Kent's lips trembled but he made no attempt to comfort Lydia. He only held her tightly and watched the fire with bright, unseeing eyes. And after what seemed a long, long time, the sobs grew less. Finally, he slipped a pocket handkerchief into Lydia's hand. It was gray with use but of a comforting size.

"Wipe your eyes, old lady," he said in a cheerful, matter of fact tone. "I've got to put the fire out, so's we can start home."

Lydia mopped her face and by the time Kent had the fire smothered with snow, she was standing, sad-eyed but calm except for dry sobs. Kent picked up one of the sticks he had brought for the fire.

"Catch hold," he said, "I'll pull you home."

Old Lizzie was watching for them and when they came stamping into the dining room, they found a pitcher of steaming cocoa and a plate of bread and butter with hot gingerbread awaiting them.

"See if you can get her to eat, Kent," said Lizzie.

"Sure, she'll eat." Kent answered her. "Gimme back my hanky, Lyd!"

Lizzie gave a keen look at Lydia's tear-stained face and turned abruptly into the kitchen. She came back in a moment to find Lydia silently eating what Kent had set before her.

Kent ate hugely and talked without cessation. About what, Lydia did not know, for the sleep that had been denied her was claiming her. She did not know that she almost buried her head in her second cup of cocoa, nor that Kent helped carry her to the couch behind the living room base burner.

"Is she sick? Shall I get the doctor?" he whispered as old Lizzie tucked a shawl over her.

"Sick! No! No! She's just dead for sleep. She's neither cried nor eat nor had a decent hour of sleep since it happened. And now, thanks to you, she's done all three. You are a good boy, Kent Moulton."

Kent looked suddenly foolish and embarrassed. "Aw—that's nothing," he muttered. "Where's my coat? Maybe I'll come out again tomorrow, if I ain't got anything better to do."

All the rest of the winter afternoon, Lydia slept. Amos came home at seven and he and Lizzie ate supper in silence except for the old lady's story of Kent's visit.

"Poor young one," muttered Amos, looking slowly toward the quiet blond head on the faded brown cushion. "I'm glad she's a child and'll forget it soon."

Lizzie gave Amos a curious glance. "You don't know Lydia, Amos," she said.

He did not seem to hear her. He moved his chair toward the stove, put his feet on the fender, lighted his pipe and then sat without moving until a stamping of feet and a hearty rap on the door roused him. Lizzie let John Levine in.

"Where's Lydia?" was Levine's first question.

Lizzie pointed to the couch, where, undisturbed, Lydia slept on.

"Good!" said John. He drew his chair up beside Amos, and the two fell into low-voiced conversation.

It must have been nine o'clock when Lydia opened her eyes to hear Amos say fretfully:

"I tell you, I went to him today as I'll go to no man again. I begged him to renew the note, but he insisted his duty to the bank wouldn't let him. I told him it would put you in a terrible fix, that you'd gone on the note when you couldn't afford it. He grinned a devil's grin then and said, 'Amos, I know you've got nothing to lose in this. If you had, for the sake of your children—I mean Lydia, I'd hold off. But Levine can fix it up!'"

"So I could, ordinarily," said Levine in a troubled voice. "But it just happens that everything I've got on earth is shoe-stringed out to hang onto that pine section of mine up in Bear county. I'm mortgaged up to my eyebrows. Marshall knows it and sees a chance to get hold of the pines, d—n him!"

Lydia sat up and rubbed her eyes.

"Well! Well! young Lydia," cried Levine. "Had a fine sleep, didn't you!"

"I'm awful hungry," said the child.

"Bless your soul," exclaimed Lizzie. "I'll warm your supper up for you in a minute."

Lydia stood with hands outstretched to the base burner, her hair tumbled, her glance traveling from Amos to Levine.

"What makes Mr. Marshall act so?" she asked.

"Shh," said Levine, "little girls your age don't know anything about such things, do they, Amos? Come here. You shall eat your supper on my lap."

"I'm getting too old for laps," said Lydia, coming very willingly nevertheless within the compass of John's long arms. "But I love you next to daddy now, in all the world."

John swept her to his knees and put his cheek against hers for a moment, while tears gleamed in his black eyes.

"Eat your supper and go to bed, Lydia," said Amos.

"Don't be so cross, Amos," protested Levine.

"God knows I'm not cross—to Lydia of all people in the world," sighed Amos, "but she worries over money matters just the way her mother did and I want to finish talking this over with you."

"There's nothing more to talk about," Levine's voice was short. "Let him call in the loan, the fat hog!"

Lydia slept the long night through. She awoke refreshed and renewed. After first adjusting herself to the awful sense of loss, which is the worst of waking in grief, the recollection of the conversation she had heard the night before returned with sickening vividness. After she had wiped the breakfast dishes for Lizzie she stood for a long time at the living room window with Florence Donbey in her arms, staring at the lake. Finally, she tucked the doll up comfortably on the couch and announced to Lizzie that she was going skating.

An hour later, Dave Marshall heard his clerk protesting outside his door and a childish voice saying, "But please, just for a minute. He likes me. He truly does."

Then the door opened and Lydia, breathless and rosy and threadbare, came into his little private office. She closed the door and stood with her back against it, unsmiling.

"I'm in quarantine," she said, "so I won't come near you."

"Why, Lydia!" exclaimed Marshall, "where did you come from!"

"Home. Mr. Marshall, won't you fix daddy's note if he gives you me?"

"Huh!" ejaculated Marshall.

"You said last fall," the child went on, her voice quavering but her eyes resolute, "that if daddy ever wanted to sell me, you'd buy me. I think I ought to be worth a thousand dollars. I can do so much work around the house and help you train Margery! I can work hard. You ask John Levine."

Marshall's fat face was purple and then pale.

"Does your father know you're here, Lydia?" he asked.

She clasped her mittened hands in sudden agitation.

"Nobody knows but you," she exclaimed. "Oh! you mustn't tell the man out there my name. I'm in quarantine and I'd be arrested, if the health office knew!"

"I won't tell," said Dave, gently. "Come over here by me, Lydia. Margery is away on a visit, so I'm not afraid for her."

Lydia crossed the room. Marshall took the skates from her shoulders and unfastened her coat.

"Sit down on that chair and let's talk this over. You know what a note is, do you, Lydia?"

"It's money you owe," she said, her blue eyes anxiously fixed on Marshall's face.

He nodded. "Yes. When your mother was sick, your father asked my bank here to lend him a thousand dollars for two years. Now, your father is very poor. He doesn't own anything that's worth a thousand dollars and I knew he could never pay it back. So I told him he must get someone to promise to pay that money for him if he couldn't, at the end of the two years. Understand?"

Lydia nodded.

"Well, he got John Levine. Now the two years are up and unless that thousand dollars is paid, the people whose money I take care of in the bank, will each lose some of that thousand. See?

Lydia stared at him, struggling to take in the explanation. "I see," she said. "But if you'd pay a thousand dollars for me, that would fix it all up."

"Why Lydia, do you mean you would leave your father?"

"I wouldn't want to," she answered earnestly, "but Lizzie could take care of daddy. He doesn't really need me. There isn't anybody really needs me—needs me—now—"

She swallowed a sob, then went on. "Mr. Levine just mustn't pay it. He's awful worried. His land's fixed so's he'd never get over it. And he's the best friend we have in all the world. He just mustn't pay it. It would kill mother, if she knew. Oh, she hated borrowing so."

Marshall chewed his cigar. "Levine," he growled, "is a long-legged crook."

Lydia flew out of her chair and shook her fist in the banker's face. "Don't you dare say that!" she cried. "He's a dear lamb, that's what he is."

Dave's fat jaw dropped. "A dear lamb, eh? Ask him some time what a land shark is—a dear lamb?"

He went on chewing his cigar and Lydia returned to her chair. Whether it was the anxious round eyes, above the scarlet cheeks, whether it was the wistful droop of the childish lips, whether it was the look that belongs to ravished motherhood and seemed grossly wrong on a child's face, whether it was some thought of his own pampered little daughter, whether it was that curious appeal Lydia always made to men, or a combination of all, that moved Marshall, he could not have told. But suddenly he burst forth.

"Good God, I've done hard things in my life, but I can't do this! Lydia, you go home and tell your father I'll renew that note, but he's got to pay the interest and 10 per cent of the principal, every year till he's paid it up. There, I'll write it down. And tell him that I'm not doing it for him or for that skunk of a Levine, but I'm doing it for you. Here, I'll write that down, too."

This is said to be a hard world. Motorists who get thrown out on the ground will say so.

FORMER MARION TWP. MAN DEAD IN WEST

William E. Clarke Passes At Advanced Age of 81 Years.

William E. Clarke, former Marion township resident, died at his home in Escondido, California, September 14, 1926, at the advanced age of 81 years 10 months, and 21 days. Deceased was born in Ireland. At the age of two years he crossed the Atlantic with his parents, being 32 days crossing from Liverpool to New York.

After a brief stay in New York City, the family moved to Ontario, Canada, where they lived until Mr. Clarke was ninteen years old, when they moved to Michigan, settling on what is known as the Clarke farm in Marion Township, Charlevoix county.

On September 24, 1864, he was united in marriage to Miss Melvina Mudge and settled on the farm at Barnard.

To this union were born four children, Homer of Idaho, Mrs. T. D. Meggison of Traverse City, Michigan, Miss Mary who died in early womanhood, and W. E. Jr. of Escondido, California.

Mr. Clarke was a life-long member of the Methodist church, was licensed to preach, and was active in every enterprise in the development of the community in which he lived, and the building and establishing of the Kingdom of God.

Impressive funeral services were held in the First Methodist church at Escondido on Thursday, September 17, conducted by his pastor, Rev. J. M. Barnhart, assisted by Rev. C. O. Swain and F. M. Kemper.

Burial was made in Oak Hill cemetary.

"They shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God." Luke 13, 29.

P. M. EXCURSION WAS HEAVILY PATRONIZED

Hundreds From Surrounding Territory Make Southern Trips

Charlevoix and vicinity was well represented on the Pere Marquette's fall excursion which left Tuesday morning for Detroit, Toledo, Chicago and other southern points. The local station took on the appearance of a busy summer day.

Station Agent Russell reports that sixty-six tickets were sold from the Charlevoix station, the largest number being for Detroit, Toledo and Chicago.

Sixty-four tickets were sold from the Petoskey station and the train, upon arriving at Charlevoix was made up of six coaches and baggage car. Mr. Russell reports that at Traverse City the special will pick up more coaches and the train will proceed from there with probably a total of fifteen.

Although the one hundred mark was not reached in ticket sales as anticipated, officials of the P. M. were well pleased with their efforts to give patrons of the road a late fall excursion at low rates.

VESPER SERVICES TO STARTED NEXT SUNDAY

Unusual Program of Autumn Events at Methodist Church

The Vesper services which proved so attractive a feature of the winter program at the Methodist church last winter will be utilized again this season.

The first of the series will be held next Sunday at 4:30 p. m. It will feature the Gospel of the Autumn season. Special features of the hour will be big young people's chorus—pantomine, "The Autumn Judgment Day," a strong presentation by an intermediate Sunday school class, a stirring sermon, "Beautifying the Gospel," pantomine, "The Song of the Coast Guard," presented by a Junior Sunday school class, a profusion of autumn decoration, attractive lights and a real spirit of worship.

The public is invited to enjoy these unusual services. The early hour makes it possible for church goers to spend a Sunday evening home or at some other church one Sunday evening per month. The offering will be used for local church expenses.

BANQUET TO HONOR FAITHFUL MEMBERS

Cong. Missionary Society Feted 58 Members of Sunday school

The Woman's Missionary Society of the Congregational Church banqueted fifty-eight members of the Sunday school who had been present ten or more Sundays during July, August and September.

Special recognition, in the form of a beautiful flower with inscribed cards attached, was accorded to twenty-one of the number who had been present every Sunday during the period.

A short program of songs, recitations, etc., completed a pleasant evening.

COUNTY NOMINEES TO GIVE BANQUET THURS.

Prominent Speakers Mentioned on Program at Wolverine Hotel

The candidates nominated for county offices in the September primaries will give a banquet for the county Republican committee, Thursday evening, October 7th, at the Wolverine Hotel, Boyne City.

The committee in charge of the program expect to have three prominent northern Michigan men as speakers, mentioning Dr. Bohn of Newberry, Calvin Campbell of Indian River, and Judge Parm C. Gilbert of Traverse City, as possible speakers. The banquet will be called at 7 o'clock standard time.

What is the price of hats per pair?

If you bought hats by the pair, you'd know that a Walk-Over shoe is the biggest value in clothes that you buy. It takes a lot of leather, lining, silk and linen thread, and two hundred operations to make a shoe. You get two shoes at one price. That makes a Walk-Over shoe cost proportionately less than hats, shirts, or any clothes you wear.

Low Cost Battery Service

Nine times out of ten, the death of a battery comes as a surprise and a shock to its owner. Out of sight, it has been out of mind. And so when it suddenly refuses to respond, like a dog to it's master's whistle, the latter feels entitled to a grievance.

Buy a Willard Battery

No wood anywhere in this battery. Nine less parts. Case and partitions are made from high grade new rubber stock and molded by heat and pressure into a single unit of iron hardness. Acid has no effect on it. Zero weather will not cause it to crack. It will give more use and stand more abuse than any other known battery made. Equip your car with a Williard.

Time to think of winter storage. Bring your batteries to us. If it needs an overhauling, we will make it as good as new.

49TH ANNUAL MEET HELD LAST WEEK

CHARLEVOIX WAS WELL REPRESENTED AT CHEBOYGAN

Plans Now Under Way for Young People's Conference at Crystal Lake

Rev. and Mrs. B. G. Mattson. and son, Teddy, Mrs. E. E. Cross, Mrs. Geo. Kilderhouse, Mrs. B. Saltonstall of Charlevoix; Mrs. Cunningham, Mrs. Dean and Mrs. King of Ironton, atteaded the anaual meeting of the Cheboygan Association of Coagregational churches last week at Cheboygan.

There was aa unusually large attendaace, the reports from the churches eacouragiag aad the uddresses helpful and inspirational.

Rev. Carl Stackman of Lansing, state director of young people's work and religious education, reported the progress made in regard to a proposed young people's coaferaace at Crystal Lake, similar to the one at Olivet.

He had visited the location and found it ideal. Mr. aad Mrs. Mattson offered their girls' caamp and equipment free of cost and the conference would be easy to reach from all northern Michigan aad Upper Peninsula.

The churches must guarantee fifty young people in order to finance the proposition at the low rate contemplated, viz; $12, which would cover board, text hooks and tuition for one week. All the pastors were enthusiastic aad a committee on co-operation nppointed.

One of the most interesting features of the association meetiag wus the talk by Rev. Abram Vanalkia, a retired pastor on "How the Fouadations Were Laid." He recouated the hardships of early dnys in the wilderness of northera Michigan and paid loving tribute to the memory of Rev. Leroy Warren for maay years state superintendent and missionary aad who orgaaized many of the churches in the association.

The Association was orgaaized forty-nine years ago at Mnneelonn and it was voted to hold the Jubilee meeting at the same place aext fall.

JUDGE GILBERT HAS NO USE FOR FLAPPERISM

We were handed the following item which was taken from the front pages of the Trnverse City dally of recent issue which we are printiag as a matter of puro news. The article was set in boldface type, boxed up, and inserted on the front page of that newspaper. It says, "Flapperism has no place ia a staid court room, accordiag to Judge Pnrm C. Gilbert aad acting upon his convictions the Judge Tuesday afteraoon ordered an Elk Rapids girl out of the court room until she could come properly dressed. Spying the girl in the court room, Judge Gilbert ordered the sheriff to briag her up to the ralling. After questioning her the Judge ordered her to leave the court room until she could come back with her arms covered and be more suitahly dressed."

REPUBLICAN BANQUET HELD LAST THURSDAY

Thirty-five Members of Committee and Nominees were Present

Last Thursday evening at the Wolverine Hotel, Boyne City, thirty-five members of the county Republicaa committee aad the successful cnadidates at the September primaries enjoyed a banquet and celebrated the Republican victory.

The meeting was in charge of Sheriff Charles Novak, chairmaa of the couaty committee. It was his plaesure to iatroduce the several speakers of the eveaing, who, in their talks, stressed the fact tbat "harmony" shouid be the aim of all la county affairs, aad that we should thank our lucky stars that we live la woaderful aorthern Michigaa and in the county of Charlevoix.

This get-to-gether meeting was to pledge to oae aaother all possible assistance for the good of the party. Among the speakers were Hon. J. M. Harris, Senator Wm. J. Pearson aad Mr. Steveas of Horton Bay.

ISLANDERS ORGANIZED GAME CLUB

OFFICERS CHOSEN AT MEETING HELD LAST WEEK

Puruose to Plant Lakes With Game Fish and Put a Few Deer on Beaver Island

Last week the men of Beaver Islaad orgaaized the Beaver Island Game Protective Club for the protectioa and preservatioa of game aad for the advancement of hunting and fishing interests of the Beaver Island group. They met at the hotel lobby and discussed the eatire proposition. Ed. Deuel of Boyne City, district warden aad Prosecuting Attorney Fitch were present to aid in the organization. Father McManmun was chosea presideat nad James Gallagher, secretary-treasurer. Bylaws will be adopted at a latter meeting a campaign started to iaclude every maa on the Islaad as members. The purpose is to enlist all of the residents ia an effort to enforce the game laws, to plant the lakes with fish and to stock the islaad with game.

The conservntion dopartment partly through the offorts of Mr. Bundy of Detroit, who has a cottage on the island, proposed to put several deer on the islaad with the idea that a fine game preserve will be established. The fiae lakes on the Big Beaver will be planted with mature bass and other game fish. An effort will be made to rid the island of the many foxes which have so multiplied of late years that smnller game has suffered.

The new organizatlon is a splendid thing. The possibilities of these lslands as a summer resort are wonderful, aad such an organization, if it will get busy and keep busy will do a great work in developmeat of these possibilities. We extend our congratulatioas to the men of the Beaver Islaads, and if this newspaper caa help in any way through publicity, we will be only too glad to do it.

LOCALS LOSE THIRD GAME

TRAVERSE CITY OUT-WEIGHED LOCALS 20 POUNDS TO A MAN

Held Victors Even in First Period. Unable to Stop Line Plunges of Heavier Team

Charlevoix threw a real scare iato the Traverse City football faas and team last Saturday afteraoon, by holdiag the heavy Traverse outfit to aa even score la the first quarter of their game played on the south side field.

Traverse scored their first touchdown on a long pass. Charlevoix evened the couat when Farmer captured a Traverse City pass aad raced 50 yards for the couater. The quarter eaded 7-7. During the remainder of the game, Traverse scored four more touchdowns, one after Charlevoix muffed a put aad the other three by straight football. Charlevoix was out-weighed 20 pounds to the man, and, uader this haadicap, made a very good showing. The locals will play a return game with Mancelonia there this coming Saturday.

Exhibiting a smashing line attack and speedy end runs in the first and fourth quarters, Petoskey high won her third straight victory last Saturday afternoon, defeatiag the lighter Harbor team on Harbor's new field, 25 to 0. Petoskey scored in five minutes in the first quarter and had the ball practically all the time during this period. Harbor played even in the second quarter aad outplayed them in third, but gave way in the last quarter.

Boyne City and Mnneeloaia high schools played aa evealy matched football battle at Boyne City, Saturday, Boyne wianing 12 to 6. Boyne showed slightly better ndvantage. Cheboygan trimmed Grnyling 51 to 0 Saturday, holdiag a 12 pound to the maa advantage over Grayling. The Soo kept her slate clean hy a 20 to 0 victory over Newberry, aad comes to Petoskey next Saturday on even terms with our neighboring city, neither team haviag lost a game so far this season. Cadillac won a close game from Ludington, Saturday, 10 to 6.

The standings of the various teams in the race for the Northern Michigan championship is as follows:

	Won	Lost	Tied
Soo	3	0	0
Cheboygan	2	1	0
*Traverse City	2	1	0

MICHIGAN HAS MINERAL WEALTH

MORE THAN 30 PRODUCTS TAKEN OUT OF MINES

Cement, Clay, Gypsum, Limestone Are Among the Many Other Enriching Deposits

Though the agriculture of Michigan is the state's greatest asset, Michigan is also a leading state in mineral wealth aad products, accordiag to R. A. Smith state geologist, writing ia the Michigan Property Owaer.

There are more than 30 mineral products with a value of between $80,000,000 and $185,000,000 produced annually. Iron ore aad copper are the most iamortant minerals and amouat to 65 per cent of the total value. In 1924 the total value of the state's miaeral products exclusive of pig iron aad the by-product coke was $135,000,000.

Cement Yield High

"The mineral products next in order of importance," writes Smith, "were Portland cement, 8,991,270 barrels valued at $16,405,761; clay products, exclusive of pottery, valued at $7,170,184; sand and gravel, 11,381,084 tons valued at $5,975,757; gypsum 577,526 tons mined and gypsum products made, valued at $5,950,822; limestoae, 9,901,910 ton valued at $5,578,642; coal, 831,020 tons valued at $3,602,055; and salt, 26,919,928 barrels valued at $3,859,155.

"The other important mineral products in order of value are pottery, sand lime brick, calcium chloride, lime, bromine, silver and trap rock. The state also produces glass sand, mineral and spriag waters, marl, potash, peat, quartz, graphite, petroleum, natural gas, sandstones and scythestone, verd antique, and mineral paints. Michigan also manufnctures coasiderable pig iroa aad by-product coke.

"In 1923 Michigan was first amoag the states ia the production of salt, bromine, calcium chloride, aad sand lime, brick; second in iron ore; third in Portlnnd cement, saad and gravel, grindstones, scythestones; fourth in copper, gypsum, and gypsum products; sixth in limestone; seveath in pig iron and peat; eighth in by-product coke; and eleveath in total value of its miaerals aad mineral products.

"The iron ore deposits are located ia the western half of the Northern peninsula. The estimated reserves January 1, 1924, were nearly 192,000,000 tons. As the aanual output varies from 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 tons the visible reserves would last from 13 to 15 years. For some years prior to 1921 aew discoveries of ore were greater thaa the out-put, but since 1021 new discoveries have lagged behind.

"Michigan, however has large deposits of lean or low grade iron ore which are not now commercial, but with the gradual exhaustion of the grade deposits there will bo an increase use of lower grade ores. In view of the large deposits of such ores the iron mining industry in Michigan probably will continue for an indefinitely long time."

OCTOBER MEETING IN SESSION

COUNTY SUPERVISORS GOING OVER YEAR'S BUSINESS

Committee Work and Reports Have Occupied First Two Days of Week

The Charlevoix County Board of Supervisors went iato session for their annual October meeting on Monday of this week with all supervisors answering the roll call. The greater part of the first two days has been taken up with committee reports and committee meetings. A few appropriatioas have beea made and officers elected as follows:

The Michigan Childrens' Aid Society of St. Joseph, Michigan, received an appropriatioa of $350.00 to help carry on their work, and the Hospital School for Crippled Children at Farmington, Mich., received a like amount.

The sum of $150.00 was appropriated for a relief fuad to be used by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Commission of Charlevoix county.

After hearing aad accepting the report of the county siaking fuad committee, the board voted that a tax fund be rnised on all real and personal property in the county to equal three mills on each dollar of assessed valuation for the year 1926, this tax to be kaown and assessed as the county sinking fuad, and to be used for the purpose of retiring county nad federal aided road bonds and interest thereon.

Theron J. Smith of Boyno City, Herman Goodman of Enst Jordan and Darwin F. Meech of Charlevoix, were elected to act as county board of canvassers for n two year period. Fraak Wangeman was elected county park commissioner for five years, Jerome Cole of Boyne City, superinteadent of the poor for three years, aad Wm. L. Fuehrer of Boyne City, county school examiner for a two year term.

Much business is yet to be completed by the board aad they will likely be ia sessioa the greater part of the week.

CAMP HAS HIGHEST RATING IN STATE

GIVEN 95 PER CENT BY MOHAWK-HOBBS GUIDE

Season at Camp Closed October 10. Many Improvements In View For Next Year

The 1926 season at the Charlevoix auto camp closed last Suaday, Octtoher 10th, the last party of tourists visiting the camp on Sunday, the 3rd. The season was a trifle shorter thaa last year on account of the last moath of raiay and bad weather.

According to figures obtained from Hugh Brady, cnretaker of the camp, a total of 702 cars took advantage of the camp's privileges this season, aad figuriag aa average of 4 people to a car, brings the total up to 2808 people. Money received ia fees amounted to $432.75, or a trifle more thaa takea in last year. Although a smaller number of cars eatered the camp this year than last, the differeace ia receipts is accounted for by renting the rear of the registration building to campers without tents and like equipment, and the difference ia numbers of days spent by differeat parties of tourists.

Work of enlarging the camp grounds is still in progress and many fine improvemeats have beea made. By clearing out the brush at the west end of the grounds near the boundry liae, room is being made for ut least eight more campers. The grounds have had a general clean up aad should prove a delight to the most finicky camper.

Charlevoix caa justly speak with pride of the rating given our auto camp by the Mohawk-Hobbs Grade and Surface Guide, published by the Mohawk Rubber Compaay and originated hy Howard F, Hobbs. E. S. Hill, associate of the originator of the guide, made a personal inspection of Michigaa caaips, and gave Charlevoix a ratiag of 95 per ceat, the highest in the state. The method of rating was as follows: Location, water, for purity and convenience; comfort stations or toilets, lights, tables and heaches, shade and shelter, shower baths or swimming oveas or stoves aad fuel, so many points being allowed for each item. The purpose of the guide is to make touring trips more enjoyable and educational and ratings on auto camps were given on merits alone.

If a child doesn't like oatmeal, win over with famous "Quaker Flavor"

THE reason some children don't eat their oatmeal without urging is that they're not given the right kind.

There is a great difference in the flavor of oats. And flavor, above all things, is needed to win a child's appetite.

Quaker Oats has a unique flavor; a rich and toasty flavor you'll find in no other brand. That is why millions will accept no other kind.

Quaker milling, too, retains much of the "bulk" of oats—which makes laxatives less often needed. Protein, carbohydrates, minerals, vitamines and this "bulk" make Quaker Oats an excellent food balance.

Today, get Quick Quaker (cooks in 3 to 5 minutes), or regular Quaker Oats as you have always known them. Grocers have both kinds.

The "Inside Story" of how the Maytag washes tubfuls of clothes in 3 to 7 Minutes!

PHONE for a Maytag on trial at your home, and learn the interesting story—the "Inside Story"—of its speed, and cleaner washing.

In the shape of its roomier cast-aluminum tub—in the powerful turn of its four-vaned gyratator—lies the secret of "Maytag Wash Hour"—the reason this wonder-washer does 50 pounds of clothes (dry weight!) in an hour or less!—the reason it washes whole tubfuls in 3 to 7 minutes!

Only by trying the Maytag can you appreciate its superior features. You must use the special automatic wringer to realize how it removes water from either a handkerchief or a blanket—how the non-denting, non-rusting tub keeps water hot during an entire washing—how free it is from machinery—how you can fill it full of water to the brim—and how it can be raised or lowered on extension legs to suit your height.

The "Inside Story" of the Maytag has a happy ending for all housewives—for you—for it means the ending of wash-day worries. Remember a Maytag trial is without obligation. If the Maytag doesn't sell itself—don't keep it.

For homes without electricity, the Maytag is available with in-built gasoline motor.

LYDIA of the Pines

by HONORÉ WILLSIE

WNU SERVICE

COPYRIGHT by FREDERICK A. STOKES CO.

CHAPTER I—Continued

He folded the bit of paper and put it in an envelope. "Come here," he said. He pinned the note into the pocket of her blouse. "Understand, Lydia," he said in a low voice, tilting her head up so that he looked down into her eyes, "I'm buying your friendship with this. You go on living with your father and taking care of him, but I'm buying your friendship for me and Margery—for good and all." He looked out of the window with a curious air of abstraction. Then, "Button your coat and run along."

"I haven't thanked you," exclaimed Lydia. "I can't thank you. Oh, but thank you, Mr. Marshall—I—I—" she began to tremble violently.

"Stop!" roared Marshall. "And you tell your father to look out for your nerves. Now skip." And Lydia's trembling stopped and she skipped.

She did not tell Lizzie of her errand and that faithful soul was too glad to see her eat her dinner to think to ask her why she had skated so long. She laid an envelope at her father's plate and when he sat down, silent and abstracted, without heeding the fish, she shook her head at Lizzie who was about to protest.

"Where'd this come from?" he asked, absentmindedly opening the envelope. Then, "For God's sake! Lydia—where? how?"

"It was like this," said Lydia. And she gave a full history of her morning's visit, to her two speechless listeners.

Amos looked from Lydia to Lizzie, from Lizzie to Lydia.

"Lydia—my little daughter—" he faltered. "I won't forget it, Lydia. In spite of little Patience's going, you've taken ten years off me this night. What do you suppose John Levine will say?"

"He'll say," replied Lydia, "'If you were ten years older, Lydia, and I were ten years younger,' and I'll say—'then we'd travel.'"

CHAPTER V

Adam

The days slipped by, as days will, even though they are grief laden. Slowly and inarticulately for the most part, Lydia struggled to adjust herself to her new loss. She went back to school, after the quarantine was lifted and the familiar routine there helped her. She was a good student and was doing well in the eighth grade.

Florence Dombey was a great comfort to the child. She slept at night with her black head beside Lydia's yellow one. Sometimes she slipped into the middle of the bed and fat Lizzie rolled on her and woke with a groan.

Lydia never entered the locked bedroom off the kitchen. Amos, self-absorbed and overworked, asked no questions, but one night in April, John Levine saw Lydia at work on a night dress for Florence Dombey.

"Where does the young lady sleep?" he asked.

Lydia explained and Lizzie uttered a mild plaint adding: "Lydia ought to be getting back to her own bed, now warm weather will be coming in."

Lydia caught her lower lip in her teeth but said nothing. Levine scrutinized the curly head bent over the sewing, then went on with his conversation with Amos. He was working quietly on his campaign, a year hence, for the office of sheriff.

Just before leaving, John asked for a drink of water and Amos went to the pump to bring in a fresh pail. He stopped while there to fuss over a barrel in which he had an old hen setting on some eggs he had got from Mrs. Norton. Lizzie had gone to bed early.

"Lydia," said John, as soon as they were alone, "come here."

When she was perched in her old place on his knee, "You don't like to sleep in that stuffy bedroom with Lizzie, do you, dear?"

"But What?" Levine's Voice Was Gentle.

"No," replied the child. "She's fat and snores and won't have the window open—but—"

"But what?" Levine's voice was gentle.

"I'm afraid to sleep alone."

"Afraid? Lydia—not of any memory of dear little Patience!"

"No! No! but I have nightmares nearly every night—she—she's choking and I—I can't help her. Then I wake up and catch hold of Lizzie. Oh, don't make me sleep alone!"

"Why, my dear little girl—" John caught the child's thin hands in a firm, warm grip. She was trembling violently and her fingers twitched. "This won't do! That's what keeps the dark rings round your eyes, is it? Of course you shan't sleep alone! Here comes your father. It's bedtime, isn't it? Good night, my dear."

Lydia picked up Florence Dombey and went slowly off to bed as her father came in with a glass of water.

"That fool hen isn't fully convinced she wants a family," he said.

The bedroom door closed after Lydia.

"Amos," said John, "that child's nerves are all shot to pieces." He related his conversation with Lydia.

"What can I do?" asked Amos, with a worried air. "Seems to me she's just got to wear it out."

Levine grunted and put on his hat. "I wish she was my daughter," he said. "If you'll ask Brown to come around to the Elks' club tomorrow, I'll talk to him."

On the Friday afternoon following when Lydia got home from school, she found the house apparently deserted. But there issued from the neighborhood of the kitchen a yipping and ki-yi-ing that would have moved a heart of stone. Lydia ran into the kitchen. The puppy wails came from behind the door of the old bedroom.

"Who's in there!" she called.

The yipping changed to deep barks of joy. Lydia tried the door. It opened easily and a great, blundering puppy hurled himself at her. Lydia was a dog lover.

"You love! You lamb!" she cried. She squatted on the floor and the pup crowded his great hulk into her lap, licking her face and wagging his whole body.

There was a note tied to his collar. Lydia untied it: "Dearest Young Lydia: Here is a friend who wants to share your bedroom with you. You must bring him up to be a polite, obedient dog, and a credit to your other friend, John Levine."

"Oh!" squealed Lydia. "Oh! but why did they tie you in here!" She looked about the room. The old bed had been moved out and the dining-room couch moved in. The bureau had been shifted to another corner. There was nothing to be seen of all little Patience's belongings. It did not look like the same room.

As she clung to the squirming puppy and stared, Lizzie came in.

"Ain't it nice?" she asked. "Mr. Levine came out with the dog this afternoon and suggested the change. He helped me. See the old quilt in the corner? That's for the dog to sleep on. Ain't he as big as an elephant! I'm afraid he'll eat as much as a man."

"He can have half of my food," cried Lydia. "Oh, Lizzie, isn't he beautiful!"

"Well, no," replied Lizzie, truthfully. "He looks to me as if some one had stepped on his face. You'd better take him out for a run."

John Levine never did a wiser or a kinder thing than to give the brindle English bulldog to Lydia. He was a puppy of nine months, well bred and strong. Lydia took him into her empty little heart with a completeness that belongs to the natural dog lover and that was enhanced by her bereavement. She and Kent cast about some time before deciding on a name. At first they thought seriously of naming him John, after the donor, but decided that this might lead to confusion. Then they discovered that Levine's middle name was Adam, and Adam the brindle bull became, forthwith.

Lydia made no objection to returning to the old room. It had lost its familiar outlines.

In May the garden was planted and in June, Lydia graduated from the eighth grade, and the long summer vacation had begun. After the episode of the note, Lydia made a conscientious effort to play with Margery at recess, and when vacation began she called for the banker's daughter regularly every week to go swimming.

Outwardly this summer was much like the previous one, except that there was a quiet contentment about Amos in spite of his real mourning for his baby daughter, that had been foreign to him for years. It was the garden that did this. Not only was it a wonderful garden to look on and to eat from, but with it Amos paid for milk and butter from the Nortons and for a part of his groceries. This made possible the year's interest and payment on the note.

Lydia sewed for Florence Dombey, climbed trees, swam and played pirates with Kent. But as a matter of fact, the old childish zest for these things had gone. For Lydia's real childhood had left her that December night she had spent under the far corner of her father's bed. She had not prayed since then. Her young faith in the kindness and sweetness of life, badly shaken by her mother's death, had been utterly destroyed when little Patience had been taken from her.

Lydia was very nervous about her first day at high school. Kent was entering at the same time and she would have liked to have asked to go with him but she knew he would resent violently being associated with a girl on so important an occasion.

So it was that one of the teachers observed a child in a faded but clean galatea sailor suit, with curly blond hair barely long enough to tie at her neck, standing in one of the lower halls after the mob of seven or eight hundred boys and girls had been successfully herded into the great assembly room.

"What is your name, my dear?" asked the teacher.

Lydia silently presented her promotion card. The teacher nodded.

"Come along, Miss Dudley, or you'll miss the principal's speech."

She seated Lydia near her in the assembly room, then looked her over curiously. The child's face was remarkably intelligent, a high-bred little face under a finely domed head. The back of her ears and the back of her neck were dirty, and her thin hands were rough as if with housework. The galatea sailor suit was cheap and coarse.

"A sick mother or no mother," was the teacher's mental tone. "I must inquire about her."

Miss Towne had the reputation of an unfeeling disciplinarian among the pupils, but Lydia did not know this. She only knew that by some miracle of kindness she came to understand the classroom system of recitations, that she was introduced to different teachers, that she learned how to decipher the hours of her recitations from the complicated chart on the assembly room blackboard, and that at noon she started for home with a list of textbooks to be purchased, and a perfectly clear idea of what to do when she returned on the morrow.

Lydia walked along slowly, thinking deeply. She knew that her list of books came to something over five dollars. She knew that this sum of money would floor her father and she knew that she would rather beg on the streets than start Amos on one of his tirades on his poverty.

When she turned into the dirt road, Billy Norton overtook her. He was wearing a very high starched collar and a new suit of clothes. Billy was a senior and felt his superiority. Nevertheless, he wanted to tell his troubles—even to a first-year pupil.

"Gee, don't I have the luck!" he groaned. "I could get on the school football team, I know it, if I didn't have to come home right after school to deliver milk. Hang it!"

Lydia looked at him quickly. "How much milk do you have to deliver?"

"Aw, just a snag. Two quarts up the road to Essers' and two to Stones'. Think of putting me off the school team for four quarts of milk!"

"Oh, Billy," gasped Lydia, "I'll do

Are You "Toxic?"

It Is Well, Then, to Learn the Importance of Good Elimination.

FUNCTIONAL inactivity of the kidneys permits a retention of waste poisons in the blood. Symptoms of this toxic condition are a dull, languid feeling, drowsy headaches and, sometimes, toxic backache and dizziness. That the kidneys are not functioning as they should is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Many readers have learned the value of Doan's Pills, stimulant diuretic to the kidneys, in this condition. Users everywhere endorse Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

Free Foot Comfort DEMONSTRATION

Monday, October 18th

Seven persons out of every ten have some form of foot trouble. It may be weak or broken-down arches, weak ankles, corns, callouses or bunions or probably a case of tired, aching, painful feet.

Regardless of what may be the nature of your foot suffering, you will find quick and lasting relief at our store during this special demonstration.

Foot Comfort Expert from Personal Staff of Dr. Wm. M. Scholl

At considerable expense this store has arranged for the services of one of Dr. Scholl's most skilled foot comfort experts. He will be pleased to see, on the above date, all persons suffering from any form of foot troubles. His services are absolutely free.

Free Pedo-graph Prints of Your Feet

In a few seconds' time, without removing the hose, he can make a perfect impression of your foot that positively shows if you do have foot troubles and to what stage the trouble has progressed.

Come in and get a sample of Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads for corns. They remove the cause—friction and pressure. Sure, safe, instant relief.

Does Distance Make Investments Good?

Charlevoix County has received hundreds of thousands within a year, for resort real estate. Shrewd outside investors did the buying. How often it happens that we see opportunities to make investments right at home—after it is too late.

CAMP FIRE NOTES

The first meeting of the seventh grade camp fire girls was called to order by Miss Wilson, guardian, and the following officers were elected by ballot:

President, Marion Smith; vice pres. Lila McMillan; sec'y., Kathleen McCall; treas., Helen Burns.

Miss Wilson told us our watchword, motto, and laws of the campfire, which we must memorize.

It was decided that we are to have our meetings every Wednesday night after school.

Meeting was adjourned.

Kathleen McCall, Sec'y.

Missionary Spoke Sunday

Miss Jenette Miller, a missionary stationed at Bailundo, West Central Africa, was here over Sunday and spoke at the Congregational church and Sunday school here also at Ironton. She has had many interesting and thrilling experiences and her stories of the wild animals, the cannibals, the witch doctors, the mission children, the famine and strange customes and conditions were most entertaining. Miss Miller is home on her year's furlough but is spending most of her time travelling among the churches and telling of her work. She is a Michigan girl and supported by the Congregational women of Michigan.

Michigan Death Rate for 1925

The Department of Commerce announced that the 1925 death rate for Michigan was 1,154 per 100,000 population as compared with 1,164 in 1924. Decreases in 1925 are shown for pneumonia, tuberculosis, cancer, smallpox, diphtheria and measles. Increases in 1925 are shown in the death rate from dirrhea and enteritis, under 2 years, influenza and nephritis.

BAD CHECKS

For a long time Michigan seemed to be a fertile field for the bad check artist. Gangs recruited in Indiana and Ohio swept through the state, leaving in their wake a sadder and wiser individual who had listened to their plausable tale about being in need of temporary funds. Due to prompt work on the part of credit associations and the newspapers they have been curbed for the time being. As these fellows apparently move in cycles, going from one state to another following exposure of their operations, it is about time we were due for another visit. Watch for them. Make it a hard and fast business rule never to cash a check for a stranger. Remember the policy of the restaurant keeper who put a sign over the cash register: "We have an understanding with the bank; we cash no checks, and the bank will serve no meals."

Wanted, a laborer and a boy, with grazing for two goats, both Protestants.

THINK IT OVER!

MORE THAN 100 YEARS AGO

a philosopher-financier said, "It is better to sleep on 4 per cent interest than to lie awake on 6 per cent."

There are any number of mining stocks, rubber plantation development companies, fake oil concerns and town-site propositions that will be only too willing to take your money and PROMISE six, eight or ten per cent interest for the use of it.

But remember this! Your money in our savings department earns 4 per cent. Sure. It is here today, tomorrow—or whenever you want it. Better take 4 per cent at home and sleep well.

Think It Over!

THE HABITS YOU FORM

before you are twenty-five are going to be a permanent part of your whole life.

The man or woman who forms the saving habit before twenty is going to have a comparatively easy life:—

Because:-the saving habit teaches adjustment to existing conditions and that always results in Economy and Contentment.

The Savings Bank Habit costs nothing—on the other hand it means a profit of all you save with 4 per cent added for good measure.

You start with $1.00.

One Dollar:-

Add Another;-

and so on, and you will soon have enough to make your first payment on a lot, a home or a little farm.

Scarcely a day passes but that one of our "Savers" with a Savings Account has accumulated the amount necessary to acquire a long cherished wish.

Suppose you start a savings account of $5. Then try the plan of adding six dollars a week to the first five. The way you will become interested in watching it grow will be a pleasure and a surprise.

Think It Over!

REPUBS. AND DEMS. SETTLE DOWN TO REAL CAMPAIGN

Democrats Would Cut Out Administration Board and G. O. P. Would Modify It

With the election but one month hence, Republicans and Democrats of Michigan have swung into the campaign home stretch with complete opposing state ticket for the first time in six years.

As a result of the primary, and of the two state conventions, the two parties now present the following slates for major state offices:

Governor

Republican—Fred W. Green of Ionia.

Democrat—William A. Comstock of Detroit.

Lieutenant Governor

Republican— Luren D. Dickinson of Charlotte.

Democrat—Garrit Masselink of Big Rapids.

Secretary of State

Republican—John S. Haggarty of Detroit.

Democrat—Mrs. Catherine Deran of Detroit.

Auditor General

Republicnn—William W. Petter of Hastings.

Democrat—Alva M. Cummins of Lansing.

Auditor General

Republican—Oramel B. Fuller of Lansing.

Democrat—John F. Cross of Three Rivers.

State Treasurer

Republican—Frank D. McKay of Grand Rapids.

Democrat—Cornelius Gerber of Fremont.

Justice of Supreme Court

Republican—Ernest A. Snow of Saginaw.

Democrat—George J. Burke of Ann Arbor.

Platform

Platforms of the two parties differ in one major respect, namely, on the question of the state administration board. On prohibition problems both platforms are silent, except for an indirect reference through advocacy of "strict enforcement of the law." Both the Republicans and Democrats have virtually ignored international problems in drawing up their platforms.

On the administrative hoard question, Green advocates retention of the board with diminished executive control through curtailment of the gubernatorial veto power.

The Democratic candidate, however, advocates complete abolition of the board, which he charterizes as unconstitutional.

Green's campaign slogan has been abolition of one-man rule, while Comstock's motto is "return state goverment to the principles of the Constitution."

GETTING PUFFED UP OVER VOTE CAST

Boyne City People Did Put Their Candidate Over

Once in great while the voters of a community turn out unl vote on election day. They did this at the recent primaries in Boyne City. In one ward every person registered cast their ballot. The other three wards did exceptionally well. The Boyne Citizens, commenting on an editorial in the Grand Rapids Herold, has this to say:

Our good friend the Grand Rapids Herald proclames the fact that Boyne City's voters turned out to a man in the 2nd ward on primary day and the voting record of the city was also worthy of special note in this day of carlessness in visiting the poles. The editorial follows:

The second wurd of Boyne City, nnd, in fact, all of Boyne City, deserve a place in the editorial columu. When the votes finally were tabulated following the recent Michigan primary, it was found that every registered voter in the second ward of Boyne City had cast a ballot; and in the whule city only 50 of the 1,200 registered had fniled to exercise the right of franchise. Our hat comes off to Boyne City. There the American system of government operates in practice as well aa in theory. Majority rule is the aim of our system of government. There can be no majority when only a slim percentage of eligible voters participate as, for example, in Grand Rnpids where from 18,000 to 25,000 voters cast ballots in election to which 60,000 are eligible. Boyne City's second ward represents the American ideal —every enfranchised man and woman participating in the business of government.

AT THE MOVIES

Real South Seas Shown in 'Moana' at Palace Theatre

Motion pictures take us to strange lands and show us strange people. We have journeyed to the north, south, east and west. Asia, Europe and Africa are open books. Both the Americas are continously before our eyes. And even Australia, the home of the Antipodes has had its share of the spotlight.

Now—we are at last to see the real South Seas. Many times have they been described in song, story and fnble; but it remained for Robert Flaherty, that interpid adventurer who filmed "Nonook of the North," to actually take his camerus and picture equipment to Samoa. There, in the company of his wife, family of three little girls, and brother David, were shot the six reels which compose "Moana", the Paramount Picture coming to the Palnce theatre Oct. 21st.

"The New Klondike," Meighan Opus, Coming

"The New Klondike," Thomas Meighan's latest Paramount production, which arrives at the Palace theatre on Oct. 16-17, is a story which brings in the atmosphere of the Florida real estate boom, with that of a baseball training camp. Scenes are laid around a small Florida town where the team is parked, and the hectic excitement of the boom resorts.

Reel Rain Wet as Real Rain, Screen Players Discover

One of the regrettable facta in the making of motlon pictures is that real rain will photograph as little more than a mist.

For rain scenes therefore, volumes of water have to be used in order to get the effect of ordinnry rainfall. During the filming of "Memory Lane," the John M. Stahl picture which comes Oct. 19-20 to the Palace theatre, a man with a hose directed a steady sheet of water over a limousine in which Eleanor Boardman and Gonrnd Nngel were trapped.

LYDIA of the Pines

by Honoré Willsie

(C) by Honoré Willsie. A. Parker Co.)
WNU Service

it for you—if—Billy, have you got your freshman textbooks still?"

"Sure," answered the boy. "They're awful banged up, but I guess all the pages are there."

Lydia was breathless with excitement. "Billy, if you'll let me have your books, I'll carry the milk for you, all winter."

The big boy looked at the little girl, curiously.

"Hanged if I'll do it. Let your dad get you new ones."

"He'd like to as well as any one, but he can't right now and I'm going to look out for my own. Oh, Billy, let me do it!"

"You can have 'em all and welcome," exclaimed Billy, with a sudden huskiness in his voice. "Gosh, you're awful little, Lydia."

Lydia stamped her foot. "I won't take anything for nothing. And I'm not little. I'm as strong as a horse."

"Well," conceded Billy, "just till after Thanksgiving is all I want. Come on along home now and we'll fix it up with ma."

Ma Norton twisted Lydia around and retied her hair ribbon while she listened. They all knew Lydia's pride, so she quenched the impulse to give the child the books and said, "Till Thanksgiving is plenty of pay, Billy, and when the snow comes, the two-mile extra walking will be too much. Get the books out of the parlor chest. You got a—a—ink on the back of your neck, Lydia. Wait till I get it off for you."

She wet a corner of a towel at the tea kettle and proceeded to scour the unsuspecting Lydia's neck and ears. "Children in the high school are apt to get ink in the back of their necks and ears," she said. "Always scrub there, Lydia! Remember!"

"Yes, ma'am! Oh, gosh, what a big pile! Thank you ever so much, Billy. I'll be here right after school tomorrow, Mrs. Norton."

Lydia spent a blissful evening mending and cleaning Billy's textbooks.

The delivering of the milk was no task at all, though had it not been for Adam trudging beside her with his rolling bulldog gait and his slavering ugly jaw, she would have been afraid in the early dusk of the autumn evenings.

It took several months for Lydia to become aware of the complicated social life going on about her. She was so absorbed while in school in adjusting herself to the new type of school life that the Christmas holidays came before she realized that, except in her classroom work, she had nothing whatever in common with her classmates.

Saturday was a busy day for Lydia at home. Old Lizzie, who was nearly sixty, was much troubled with rheumatism and even careless Lydia felt vaguely that the house needed a certain amount of cleaning once a week. So, of a Saturday morning, she slammed through the house like a small whirlwind, leaving corners undisturbed and dust in windrows, but satisfied with her efforts. Saturday afternoon, she worked in the garden when the day was fair, helping to gather the winter vegetables. Before Lydia became of age she had gone to Sunday school, but since that time she had not entered a church. So Sunday became her feast day. She put in the entire morning preparing a Sunday dinner for her father and nearly always John Levine.

Christmas came and went, sadly and quietly. Lydia was glad when the holidays were over and she was back in school again. On her desk that first morning lay a tiny envelope, addressed to her. She opened it. In it was an invitation from Miss Towne to attend a reception she was tendering to the members of her algebra and geometry classes, freshmen and seniors.

For a moment Lydia was in heaven. It was her first formal invitation of any kind. Then she came rapidly to earth. She had nothing to wear! It was an evening party and she had no way to go or come. She put the precious card in her blouse pocket and soberly opened her "Civil Government."

At recess, she sat alone as she was rather prone to do, in the window of the cloak room, when she heard a group of girls chattering.

"Who wants to go to grouchy old Towne's reception when you can go to a dance? I've got two bids to the Phi Pi's party," said a fourteen year-old miss.

"Oh, we'll have to go or she'll flunk us in algebra," said another girl. "I'll wear my pink silk organdie. What'll you wear?"

"My red silk. Maybe she'll let us dance. I suppose Charlie and Kent'll both want to take me."

"Terrible thing to be popular! Hasn't Kent the sweetest eyes! Do you know what he said to me the other night at the Evans' party?"

The girls drifted out of the cloak room. Lydia sat rigid. Pink organdie! Red silk! Kent's "sweetest eyes"! Then she looked down at the inevitable sailor suit, and at her patched and broken shoes. So far she had had few pangs about her clothes. But now for the first time she realized that for some reason she was an alien, different from the other girls—and the realization made her heart ache.

Lizzie was as excited as Lydia when she heard of the invitation.

"There's that gray serge of your mother's," she said. "It's awful faded. And there's a piece of a light blue serge waist she had. Lydia, let's get 'em dyed red. Smitzky's will do it in a couple of days for us. I'll pay for it out of the grocery money."

"Do you think we can fix it so it won't look made over?" asked Lydia, torn between hope and doubt.

"Of course we can. You choose your pattern tomorrow and I'll get in to town in the morning with the goods, rheumatiz or no rheumatiz."

Amos heard of the invitation with real pleasure. Nor did the clothes problem trouble him. "Pshaw, wear that green Sunday dress of yours. You always look nice, Lydia, whatever you wear. And I'll take you up there and call for you. If all the boys in school was running after you, I wouldn't let one of 'em beau you round before you was eighteen. So put that kind of a bee out of your bonnet for good and all."

Lydia lived the next two weeks in the clouds. The new-old dress was finished the day before the reception. There had been minutes of despair in creating this festive garment. The dyeing process had developed unsuspected moth holes. The blue and the gray serge did not dye exactly the same shade, nor were they of quite the same texture. However, by twisting and turning and adding a yoke of black silk, which had for years been Lizzie's Sunday neck scarf, a result was produced that completely satisfied the little dressmaker and old Lizzie.

Miss Towne was the only daughter of one of the old New England families of Lake City. Teaching was an avocation with her and not a bread and butter necessity. At eight o'clock on a Saturday evening, Amos left Lydia at the front door of her house, and in a few minutes Lydia was taking off her hat and coat in the midst of a chattering group of girls.

After a general "Hello," Lydia slipped downstairs to find her hostess, Miss Towne, the grouchy, the strict and the stern Miss Towne, moving among her guests, saw the thin little figure hesitating in the doorway, saw the cobbled red dress, with skirt that was too short and sleeves that were too long and neck that was too tight, saw the carefully blacked school shoes, saw the intelligent high-bred head nobly set on straight shoulders and the wonderful dusty gold of the curly hair, and the puzzled, bashful blue eyes.

"Oh, Lydia!" cried the grouchy Miss Towne, "weren't you a dear to come clear into town for my party. Mother—" this clearly for all the children to hear, "this is the pupil I've told you of, the one of whom we're all so proud. Come over here, Lydia."

Lydia moved carefully. Her most moth-eaten breadth was at the back, and it was difficult to cross the room without unduly exposing that lack. But she reached the safe haven of Miss Towne's side before the bevy of multi-colored organdies entered the room.

Kent was there. He had brought the pink organdie. He waved a gay hand to Lydia, who waved back, gayly, too. Her cheeks were beginning to burn scarlet, partly because a real party was a wonderful thing and partly because of the multi-colored organdies. Charlie Jackson, a splendid, swarthy Indian boy of sixteen, was there. He lived with Doctor Fulton as office boy and general helper and the doctor was clothing and educating him. Charlie was halfback of the school football team, a famous player and a great favorite. The girls flirted with him. The boys were jealous of his favor. Even in the snob-ridden high school there was here a hangover of the pure democracy of childhood.

Miss Towne had provided games and refreshments bountifully. But it was a difficult matter to entertain these youngsters already accustomed to a grownup social life. Miss Towne had declared that there should be no dancing. But the games were neglected and the guests stood about in frankly bored groups. So when a bevy of organdies begged for permission to dance, Miss Towne, with obvious reluctance, gave in.

From that moment, the party was an assured success. Lydia, who had stuck like a little burr at Miss Towne's side all the evening, looked on with wonder and a growing lump in her throat.

"Don't you dance, my dear?" asked Mrs. Towne.

"Of course she doesn't, mother," answered Miss Towne, "she's just a child. There's time enough for those things after high school. I don't know what's going to become of this generation."

This was small comfort to Lydia, watching the pretty groups twirl by.

Kent, hagging the pink organdie, stopped on the far side of the room from Lydia to get a drink of lemonade.

"Isn't Lydia's dress a scream," said Olga.

"Huh?" asked Kent in surprise. He followed his partner's glance across the room.

Unseen Sources of Long Life

The basic sources of automobile value are not always apparent to the eye.

A motor car, like a house, may LOOK a great deal more substantial than it really is.

Because of this difficulty, more and more thousands are turning to Dodge Brothers product for insurance against disappointment.

The years have proved, and each year proves anew, that Dodge Brothers are as deeply concerned with the UNSEEN goodness of their motor car, as with the seen.

The mileage it will deliver, the safety it will provide, the expense and trouble it will save the owner over a period of years, are quite as important to Dodge Brothers as the more obvious details of equipment and style.

e Womnn's Christian Temper- Union met last Friday at the of Mrs. Frank Partridge with t twenty-five present.

fter the devotionals and routine business, severnl ladies related their experiences ns delegates to the Republicnn county convention.

An encouraging report of the National Prohibition Guards was to the effect that the Guards had been organized in four Sunday schools, thnt progrnms had been given in all the schools September 26, using material furnished by the Union and thnt plans were under way for n union meeting of the Guards on world temperance Sunday, October 31st.

A change in the constitution was recommended to be acted on at the next meeting. This would create the office of vice president at large.

Officers for 1927 were elected as follows:

President, Mrs. B. Saltonstall, cor. sec'y., Mrs. A. J. Usher; rec. sec'y, Mrs. S. D. Rife; treas.; Mrs. L. E. Benton.

Vice presidents were appointed as follows:

Baptist church, Mrs. Wm. S. Kibbe; Christian Science, Mrs. Cassie Hnrt; Church of God, Mrs. S. D. Turner; Congregational, Mrs. Geo. Kilderhouse; Episcopal, Mrs. H. B. Jacobs; Methodist, Mrs. E. A. Stewart.

Mrs. H. B. Jacobs presented the topic, "The Direct Primary," and an interesting discussion followed.

The hostess served delicious refreshments and the union adjourned to meet in November with Mrs. Shores.

MISS CHARLEVOIX RECEIVES MENTION

October Number of "Boating" Carries Story and Picture

The following story, accompanied by a photograph of the Miss Charlevoix, was contained in the October number of Boating published at Peoria, Ill. The article which speaks for itself, follows:

Outside of Detroit and Algonac, Charlevoix, Michigan, possesses probably the fastest and most graceful boat job in that state. She is Miss Charlevoix, pictured herewith, rendy for campaigning on the water race tracks. Miss Charlevoix was one of the conspicuous entrants at the annual regatta of the M. V. P. A. association at Louisville, she raced and won on home waters and more recently at Pine Lake, Mich. The boat was built and is owned by M. Roy Brady of the Brady Boat Works. She is powered with a marine conversion of a Hispano engine and rates as a sixty miler. While Mr. Brady might rate as a speed enthusiast, Mrs. Brady is even more of a fan for the flyers and she usually accompanies Mr. Brady in racing this craft. Not only does Miss Charlevoix operate as an effective advertising medium for the beautiful summer resort city whose name she carries, but she is the flagship of the Charlevoix Boat Club, one of the recently acquired new members of the Mississippi Valley Power Boat Association.

W. C. T. U. NOTES

The state convention will be held at Owosso, November 9-12.

Mrs. Stella B. Robin, state vice president and prominent in state politics, advises us to vote "NO" on the question of calliug a constitutional convention to revise the state constitution. The Michigan Constitution contains a provision prohibiting the manufactor and sale, etc., of intoxication liquors. If the amendment should pass a great effort would be made to elect "wet" delegates who would omit our present dry provision from the proposed new constitution.

"The direct primary is not perfect but let's use it and improve it;let's refuse to go back to the old way of nomination by the few."

The National League of Woman Voters have passed and reaffirmed this resolution:

"Resolved, That the utmost resistance of the League be exerted in opposition to any attempt to repeal tho state primary laws, that support be given to proposed amendments which tend to make nominations more representative of masses of the people."

Until something better is offered, let us keep what we have. USE IT! WATCH IT! IMPROVE IT!

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

GREEN'S MAJORITY MAKES SLUSH FUND CHARGE LOOK WEAK

Mayor Green's majority of 160,000 outside of Wayne (which he carried by 21) makes Mr. Comstock's slush fund charge sound puerile. You couldn't have taken hundred-dollar bills nnd secured any more votes for Green, which answers Comstock's demand for an investigation. In several places Green didn't win because of his friends hut in spite of them. In other words, a million dollars couldn't huve nominated Groesbeck for a fourth term nnd a single dime would have served Mayor Green just as effectively as what was spent in his behalf, however much it wns. It was the old story. These turnovers go in cycles. In our day we have seen Burrows, Townsend and Groesbeck take the political count of ten, all good officers to he sure but victims of a greed that is recorded several times in Ecclesiastes. "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," or brought down to date, the wisest politician is the ona who know when to quit. There is no repair to the old political pitcher.

FOURTH ANNUAL GAYLORD SHOW

HELD FIRST WEEK OF NOVEMBER ON 3rd, 4th and 5th.

Essay Contest in Connection With Show Attracting Considerable Interest

The essay contest held in connection with the Top O' Michigan contest is attracting considerable interest among the teachers and children of the rural districts of northern Michigan. The Bloom Company of Detroit, a commission firm, is offering $40.00 in cash prizes, ranging from $15.00 for 1st place to $3.00 for 5th place to the winners in this contest.

The subject of the essay is "How I would grow and grade potatoes (or apples) for quality." This subject is a very timely one. Every grower of potatoes and apples in northern Michigan should be interested in the vital problem of grading their products. The boys and girls entered in this contest will be contributing a great deal to the growers of northern Michigan in addition to carrying off the cash prizes.

In order to be elegible to competition in the contest, the girl or boy must be enrolled in school nnd not be advanced beyond the 9th grade. Some of the other requirements are as follows:

The essay must be limited to 1000 words.

The essay must be submitted to the teacher of their own school who will send the best two to the county school commissioner.

The county school commissioner will forward the best three to the premium committee of the show which will select the best one to represent the county.

Three candidates from each county will be guests of the Potato Show on Friday the 5th of November.

Candidates must be present on that date to win the prizes. Winners will be announced at a dinner in honor of the school children Friday noon.

Essays must be in the hands of the school commissioner by the 28th of October and in the hands of the committee by November 3rd.

Essays must be written in ink on regulnr office paper.

For further information address A. C. Lytle, secretary, Top O' Michigan Potato & Apple Show, Gaylord, Michigan.

BOARD CLOSES BUSY SESSION

WIND UP COUNTY BUSINESS IN RECORD TIME OF 6 DAYS

Charlevoix Hospital and Mich. Tourist & Resort Assn. Each Get $1,000.00

The Chsrlevoix county board of supervisors went into session last Monday and adjourned last Friday evening, winding up their annual October session in the record time of six days. In previous years the session has last from one to two weeks.

Continuing a report of the doings of the board since last week's issue of the Courier, we hnd the following recommendations and appropriations made:

The board recommended that the judge of probate give consideration to applications for widow's pension presented before him, where the applicant is in possession of farm property or other property and without sufficient revenue to provide for her children.

The report of the Fair committee showed that the total receipts of the Fair last fall were $4,371.17, and that total disbursements were $4,363.27. The board voted an appropriation of $2,000.00 to carry on the work of the Charlevoix County Agricultural Society for next year.

The report of the county poor commission showed that the infirmary had taken care of 35 inmates during the year, with a total attendance of 8080 days at a cost of $7,778.67, or $.7882 per day.

Burton Mellencamp, county agricultural agent, appeared before the board and made a complete report of the activities and accomplishments of his department for the past year, which included a report on the T. B. cow testing work in the county. The board voted to appropriate the sum of $1,200.00 for continuance of this work. It was also voted to appropriate the sum of $1,500.00 to cover the expenses of the county agricultural extension work for Charlevoix county for the year 1927.

The report of the county road commissioners showed that total receipts from all sources were $104,790.70 and total expenditures $81,139.59, expended as follows: construction, $24,529.62; maintenance, $29,736.47, equipment and repairs, $16,186.03; material, $5,620.12; general expenses, $5,067.35; The report showed that 30,744 feet of new gravel road had been built and maintenance work on 23 county roads and some state trunk lines taken care of. It was voted to raise a 3½ mill county rond tax for 1927, which will be expended as follows: maintennnce, $15,000.00; equipment, $2,370.79; 1 mile on Marion Center road, $6,000; 1¼ miles on Horton Bay north road, $6,000.00; 1 mile on Ironton south road; $6,000.00; 1 mile on Boyne Falls East road, $4,000.00; for part of 1926 work on King's Highway, $500.00.

H. A. Craig will head a committee composed of H. C. Stephens, C. Schuab, Charles Murphy and Wm. J. Pearson to meet at some future date with other northern Michigan supervisors who will act on the advisability of building a northern Michigan T. B.

WOMEN VOTERS HELD MEETINGS

ORGANIZATION IN COUNTY IS NOW COMPLETED

League of Woman Voters Take Active Interest in County and State Politics

Mrs. Henry Sherrard, state president of the League of Woman Voters, held two meetings in the county recently, helping to complete the organizntion which was undertsken two years ago but never functioned.

Thirty ladies uttended the meeting in Charlevoix October 13th, and about the same number nt the Boyne City meeting on the 15th, when there were representatives of the three big towns present and officers elected as follows:

President, Mrs. Jas. Secord, East Jordan.

First vice president., Mrs. Russell Barden, Boyne City.

2nd vice president, Mrs. James Simmons, Charlevoix.

3rd vice president, Miss Agnes Porter, East Jordan.

Secretary, Mrs. J. R. Furman, Boyne City.

Treasurer, Mrs. R. B. Armstrong, Charlevoix.

Board Members at Large:

Mrs. W. S. Shaw, Boyne City.

Mrs. B. Saltonstall, Charlevoix.

Mrs. L. A. Hoyt, East Jordan.

The various vice presidents are to be chairmen of the local units. Dues are 50 cents per annum. Three meetings a year are planned.

A meeting of the local unit of the Charlevoix County League of Woman Voters is called for 2:00 p. m. next Monday, at the home of Mrs. Henry Jacobs, 208 Clinton street, to study the state constitution and transact any business which may be suggested. Some of the women from Boyne City and East Jordan plan to be present. "Any woman interested will be welcome at the meeting and as a member.

The county league of woman voters has taken an active part in county and state politics for the past few years. With their complete organization now accomplished, they will undoubtedly play an important part in future elections.

SURPRISE PARTY AT BELLAIRE SUNDAY

Forty-five Were Present to Enjoy Annual Affair

Forty-five people were present nt a surprise party given in honor of Arlie und Frank Smith at Bellaire last Sunday. The party is an annual affair and a very enjoyable one.

Those present from Charlevoix were: Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Smith and family, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Smith nnd family, Mr. and Mrs. Steve Smith and family, Mr. and Mrs. H. Gebeau and family, Mr. and Mrs. Milton Block and family, Helen McFarland, P. R. Ross and family, Robert Howe and Roy Ripley and family.

A fine potluck supper was a feature of the merry party which turned out to be a very delightful occasion.

The ladies of the M. E. Literary and Sewing Club will serve a supper at the M. E. church, Friday evening, October 29th, from 5:30 until all are served. Price 25 and 50 cents.—Adv. 42-t2.

Monday, November 1st, is the date when Dr. J. Leahy, the Optometrist, will be at the Charlevoix Hotel.—Adv. 42t2.

THE MYSTERY HAS BEEN UNCOVERED

The reason for Immature Grey Hairs Now Plainly Seen

The writer has before him n day book kept by Nathan P. Parker, grandfather of Frank F. Bird, county regigter of deeds, which in a very concise manner shows us why our grandfsthers could get along nicely on the small wages of from $1 to $1.50 per day, and also sheds a light on the reason why people nowadays have to stretch $5 per day to make ends meet.

Mr. Parker was n government surveyor and done most of the surveying for railroads in the state of Illinoise. The book dates back to the year 1853, and its contents is very interesting. Here are s few expenditures and the nmount pnid:

Hair cut, 12½ cents; dinner, supper, lodging and breakfast, 37½ cents; 5 days board and lodging, $1.50; tapping pair of boots, 50cents; 13 meals, $1.55. Another item shows that he paid $5.08 for 16 days board and lodging and his total expenses for the month amounted to $6.95.

We are inclined to believe that the present generation would not trade their present-day conveniences and luxuries at any cost, but it sure is a revelation to look back over the items in this interesting little book.

CHANGE OF NAME NOW AUTHORIZED

PINE LAKE WILL BE KNOWN AS LAKE CHARLEVOIX

Resolution Adopted by Board of Supervisors Authorized by the Geographic Board

At the June session of our county board of supervisors, a resolution was adopted whereby the nnme of Pine Lake was changed to that of "Lake Charlevoix" and the county clerk was at that time directed to inform the wnr department of this action.

They found upon investigation, that some 25 lnkes within the boundaries of Michignn were known as "Pine Lakes," and the name of Pine Lake being used so generally it became confusing to tourists and other summer guests and hampered the development of resort properties along the lnke shores. The word "Pine" is generally assumed to mean that the soil is snndy thereabouts and that the vegetation is limited almost entirely to Pine trees, this not being true with "Lake Charlevoix" shores, as this lake is surrounded hy a fine growth of maple, beech, white birch, evergreen, cedars ns well as pines.

A copy of the resolution adopted by our board of supervisors was forwarded to the war department at Washington and they in turn referred the matter to the U. S. geographic board who did on October 6th, 1926, adopt the name of "Charlevoix" which replaces the name of "Pine Lake" in Charlevoix county. A letter from the U. S. geographic board to Senator James Couzens is as follows:

October 14, 1926.

Hon. James Couzens,
U. S. Senate.

My Dear Senator Couzens:—I am pleased to inform you that the U. S. Geographic Board, at the meeting October 6th, 1926, adopted the name "Lake Charlevoix" for the lake in Charlevoix county, Michigan, hitherto called Pine Lake.

I have informed the Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army, respecting this.

Very truly yours,
James McCormick, Secretary,
U. S. Geographic Board, Washington, D. C.

LAND-LOOKERS VISITED LAKE CHARLEVOIX

A. E. Mitchell of Grand Rapids, representing Kinsay & Buys Co. resort department, came to Spring Water Beach on Lnke Charlevoix, Saturday, with a Greyhound load of land-lookers, interested in purchasing lots in this new plat, there being 14 in the party.

Thirty lots have nlready been sold on the plat, which was opened August 15. It is expected that five bungalows of cobblestone construction will be erected on this plat by tha timo the 1927 resort season opens.

Most of those who came to Lake Charlevoix, Saturday, were making their initial trip to the north and were greatly pleased by the scenic view and the shore line of Lake Charlevoix.

LOCALS LOSE FOURTH GAME

INJURIES FORCE OUT TWO STARS IN FIRST QUARTER

Farmer and Marshall will Be on Sidelines at Harbor Game Here Saturday

Charlevoix high school's foothall eleven dropped their fourth successive game this season to Mancelona last Fridsy, by the score of 9 to 0.

Charlevoix received the kick-off and advanced the ball well out of their own territory on the first play of the game. Farmer took the ball for 12 yards and Higman followed this gain with 7 yards more. Marshall fumbled and Mancelona took the ball. On the next play Farmer was injured and had to be taken out and Marshall was taken out the next play following. This was the turning point in the game for the vietors, who took advantage of the breaks and scored a drop kick and a touchdown, the half ending 9-0. After a warm lecture from Coach Buehen, the squad took the field in the second half and held Mancelona to a 0-0 score.

It is probable that neither Marshall nor Farmer will be in the line-up for Saturday's game with Harbor Springs here. Coach Buehen is working hard with substitutes to fill these vacant positions and Harbor can look for plenty of action.

Results of other northern Michigan games were as follows:

Petoskey high school made it four straight victories last Saturday by defeating the fast Soo eleven at Petoskey, 6-0, in one of the best exhibitions ever staged at Petoskey. This is Soo's first defeat of the season after having played the large schools in the upper peninsula. Petoskey has not been scored upon in any of her four games this year. Many Charlevoix football fans motored to Petoskey to witness the game.

Boyne City, with eight letter men in the line-up, fought the strong Cadillac team to a stand-still last Saturday afternoon in their annual game, winning 6-0. Boyne's team, which has lost one game this season, has been showing gradual improvement since the beginniug of the season, and the Boyne-Petoskey game to be played on Saturday of this week should be a top-notcher. If Boyne can upset Petoskey, they have an excellent chnnce to tie for first place.

Traverse City remained an undefeated team in the race for the northern Michigan championship by defeating Alpena at Traverse last Saturday, 24 to 9. Traverse came from behind with a score 9-6 at the end of the first half, and scored 18 points to win in the lnst two quarters.

East Jordan took the measure of Frankfort lnst Friday, trimming their opponents 20 to 0. Harbor Springs had no game scheduled.

Mothers Look for the Quaker's picture when buying oats.

That means richer flavor

WHEN children say they don't like oats, it's usually because rich Quaker flavor is missing.

Children who ordinarily don't take to oats are often quickly won to this important food, simply by giving them "Quaker."

The flavor is uniquely different; toasty, rich and creamy, Quaker Oats alone has it. Some 50 years were spent in perfecting it.

Quaker milling, too, retains much of the "bulk" of oats. And that makes laxatives less often needed. Thus protein, carbohydrates and vitamines and "bulk" combine in making Quaker Oats an excellently balanced ration.

Hoot Has Hard Time With Spook

Wanting to do one thing but forced by fear of death to do aaother was the event in "Spook Ranch," a Universal-Gibson Special which will be at the Palace theatre commencing Tuesday and Wednesday, which led to a series of comic and also serious situations for Hoot Gibson and his leading lady, Helen Ferguson.

Miss Ferguson plays the part of a Spanish girl who is held prisoner in a ranch house which is believed to be haunted. A gang of half a dozen ruffians are holding her and her father in an effort to obtain from them the secret location of a valuable mine on the ranch property. When Hoot enters, playing the part of Bill Bangs, a Texas cowboy prospecting for gold on the edge of the Mojave desert, he finds that the girl, Elvira, is apparently a prisoner but he dosn't comprehend the entire situation, and in a talk with the girl she first starts to tell him the truth but then changes her story when she sees herself threatened through the portiers.

Doughboys Fight War Over in Movies

"None but former doughboys need apply!"

That was the slogan of George Fitzmaurice when recruiting a battery of field artillery, a troup of cavalry and a company of infantry, which he used at United Studios for a wartime sequence in his screen version of famous stage play, "The Dark Angle." His entire young army was manned and officers by A. E. F. veteaaas, and a military atmosphere on the lot was complete.

"The Dark Angle," to be First National's offering at the Palace theater next Saturday and Sunday, features Ronald Colman, himself a veteran of the London Scottish during the World war, and Vilma Banky, Samuel Goldwyn's Budapest beauty, who makes her American debut in this picture.

Cullen "Hezi" Tate, who assisted Fitzmaurice in the direction of "The Dark Angel," proved of immense value in the filming of the wartime sequence because of his own experience as an officer of the A. E. F.

The Cooking Class

Lydia with parted lips and big, wistful eyes stood quietly beside Miss Towne.

"What you giving us," said Kent. "Red's my favorite color."

"Red's all right," Olga tossed her head, "but that dress! She ought to know better. A five-cent cheese cloth would have been better'n that."

Kent was truly enamored of pretty Olga but he looked at her angrily.

"You girls make me sick," he grunted and started dodging among the dancers, across the room to Lydia's side. Olga stood pouting.

"What's the matter?" asked Charlie Jackson.

"Oh, I just said Lydia's dress was a fright and Kent went off mad."

Charlie in turn stared at Lydia.

Kent in the meantime was grinning at Lydia unduly.

"Hello, Lyd! Want to dance?"

"I can't. Don't know how," replied Lydia, despondently.

"Easy as anything. Come on. I'll teach you."

Lydia seized Kent's lapel, with fingers that would tremble slightly. "Kent, I dassn't stir. My back breadth don't match and my skirt hangs awful."

"Oh, shucks!" replied Kent, angrily, "you girls are all alike. Red's my favorite color."

"Mine too," said Charlie Jackson at her elbow. "What're you two arguing about?"

"Her dress," growled Kent. "I don't see anything the matter with it, do you?"

"Nope, and it's on the prettiest girl in the room, too, eh, Kent?"

"You bet," returned Kent, believing, though, that he lied, for Olga was as pretty as a tea rose.

Lydia blushed and gasped.

"If you won't dance, come on over and have some lemonade," suggested Kent.

"If I sit in the window, will you bring me a glass?" asked Lydia, still mindful of the back breadth.

"You take her to the window and I'll get the lemo, Kent," said Charlie.

Kent led the way to the window-seat. "You're a good old sport, Lyd," he said. "Charlie'll look out for you. I gotta get back to Olga."

He returned to make peace with the pink organdie. She was very lovely and Kent was having his first flirtation. Yet before he went to sleep that night the last picture that flitted before his eyes was of a thin little figure with worn mittens clasped over patched knees and a ravished child's face looking into his.

Charlie Jackson sat out two whole dances with Lydia. Their talk was of Adam and of fishing. Lydia longed to talk about Indians with him but didn't dare. Promptly at ten, Amos appeared at the front door.

Lydia's first party was over. Amos and old Lizzie were charmed with Lydia's description of it and were sure she had had a wonderful time. But Lydia felt that the dress had made of the party a hideous failure. She knew now that she was marked among her mates as a poverty-stricken little dowd whom popular boys like Kent and Charlie pitied.

And yet because life is as kind to us as we have the intelligence to let it be, it was out of the party that grew slowly a new resolve of Lydia's—to have some day as pretty hands and as well-shod feet as Olga and Hilda and Cissy, to learn how to make her dresses so that even the composing of an organdie might not be beyond her.

John Levine was running for sheriff on the Republican ticket. He was elected early in April by a comfortable majority and invited Amos and Lydia to a fine Sunday dinner in celebration at the best hotel in town.

Lydia's life was so different from that of any of the children that she knew, that growing into adolescence with the old bond of play disappearing, she fell back more and more on resources within herself. This did not prevent her going faithfully once a month to call on Margery Marshall. And these visits were rather pleasant than otherwise. Margery was going through the paper doll fever. Lydia always brought Florence Dombey with her and the two girls carried on an elaborate game of make-believe, the intricacies of which were entirely too much for Elvira Marshall, sitting within earshot.

Amos' garden was a thing of beauty. Its trim rows of vegetables were bordered with sunflowers, whose yellow heads vied in height with the rustling ears of corn. Amos had a general grudge toward life. He had a vague, unexpressed belief that because he was a descendant of the founders of the country, the world owed him an easy living. He had a general sense of superiority to his foreign-born neighbors and to the workmen in the plow factory.

But in his garden, all his grudges disappeared. He always felt nearer to his wife, in the garden. She, too, had been bred on a New England farm. He always felt as if the fine orderliness of the rows was for her.

Lydia greatly preferred weeding the garden to cleaning the house. Indeed the contrast between the fine garden, the well kept patch of lawn and the disorderly house was startling.

One afternoon in August, clad in her bathing suit, now much too small for her, she was working in the garden, when a voice behind her grunted: "Eat!"

Lydia jumped and turned. The old squaw of two years before stood hugging. She was as pitifully thin as ever. As she stared at the ugly old Indian, Lydia's throat tightened. She seemed to feel baby Patience's fingers clinging to hers in fear.

"Want some vegetables?" she asked, motioning toward the garden.

The squaw nodded eagerly and held up the dirty apron she was wearing. Lydia began slowly to fill it, talking as she worked.

"Where do you live?" she asked.

The Indian jerked her gray head toward the north "Big Woods."

"But that's twenty miles. It must take you a long time to walk it. Poor thing!"

The squaw shrugged her shoulders. Lydia stared at the toothless, trembling old mouth, hideous with wrinkles, then at the gnarled and shaking old hands.

"Haven't you anyone to take care of you?"

"All sick—boy sick—man sick—girl sick. All time sick, all time nothing to eat."

"But won't some other Indian make you a garden, a little one?"

Again the squaw shrugged her shoulders. Her apron was full now. She produced a string from inside her waist and tying the apron up bag-like, she slung it over her shoulder. Then she gave Lydia a keen glance.

"Friend," she said, briefly, and turning, she tottered painfully out of the gate.

Followed by Adam, Lydia walked thoughtfully out upon the little pier Amos had built. It was hard to understand how the Indians with all their rich pine land could be so poor. She resolved to ask her father and Levine about it and turned a somersault into the water. She swam about until tired, then turned over on her back to rest. Lying so a shadow drifted across her face and she raised her head. A gray birch bark canoe floated silently beside her. In it, in a gray bathing suit, sat Charlie Jackson.

"Goodness!" exclaimed Lydia. "How in the world you do it so quietly, I don't see. Come on in. It's as warm as suds."

Charlie shot his canoe to the pier and in a moment was floating beside Lydia. She took a deep breath, let herself sink and a moment or two later came up several yards beyond him. He did not miss her for a moment, then he started for her with a shout. A game of tag followed ending in a wild race to the pier.

"You certainly are a little sunfish in the water," panted Charlie, as they sat with feet dangling off the pier.

"Ought to be, I'm in it enough," returned Lydia. "Charlie, there's a poor old squaw came here today. What's the matter with the Indians? Why don't they work?"

Charlie's mouth twisted in a sneer. "Why don't they work? Why don't the whites give 'em a chance? Dirty thieves, prowling round like timber wolves. Ask Dave Marshall. Ask that gumshoeing crook of a Levine. Don't ask me."

"Levine's not a crook," shouted Lydia. "He's my friend."

The sneer left Charlie's face and he laughed. "Your friend is he, little sunfish?"

"Yes," said Lydia, furiously. "He gave me Adam," hugging the dog's ugly, faithful head. He immediately tried to sit in her wet lap. "And he's done as much for me as my own father."

"If he's your friend," said the Indian gently, "I won't speak against him to you again."

Lydia instantly was mollified. Charlie was so old and so young! He was so different from Kent that stirring into his deep black eyes, Lydia suddenly felt his alien race.

"I must go in and dress," she said. "It's time to get supper."

Charlie nodded and untied his canoe.

"Daddy," Lydia said that night at supper, "why should Mr. Marshall and Charlie Jackson both say Mr. Levine is a crook?"

Amos ate a piece of bread meditatively before replying. "Any man that goes into politics in this country leaves his reputation behind him. You and I'll never have a better friend than John Levine."

Lydia nodded. She was only a child, after all, and still retained implicit faith in the opinion of those she loved. She went back to school that fall full of interest and importance. She was a sophomore now and very proud of the fact that she knew the ropes. Her arrangement with Billy held for his second-year books. With much pinching of the grocery money, Lizzie had achieved two new galatea sailor suits and so while she felt indubitely inferior to the elaborately gowned young misses of her grade, Lydia was not unhappy.

She planned a real feast for Thanksgiving. She negotiated with Billy Norton for the exchange of two pounds of fudge for a brace of wild duck. The Saturday before Thanksgiving, she gave the house its usual "lick and promise" and then started out with her skates to enjoy the first ice of the season.

She had a glorious morning. There was no snow and the lake had frozen crystal clear. The air was breathless. As she skated she chanted, to improvised tunes, bits of verse.

She hunted through Scottish mountains and moors, she whirled from Ghent to Aix and still high-hearted and in the land of visions, took off her skates and entered the house. She banged the door, then stood for a moment staring. Elvira and Margery were seated before the living room stove, while old Lizzie sat on one edge of Amos' arm chair eyeing the two belligerently.

Margery was wearing a new fur coat. Her beautiful black eyes looked out from under a saucy fur-trimmed hat with a scarlet quill on the side. Elvira wore black broadcloth with fox collar and muff. Lydia, in a remodeled coat of her mother's, and her old tam and mended mittens, recovered from her surprise quickly.

"Hello!" she said. "When did you come? This is the first time you've ever been in our house, Mrs. Marshall, isn't it?"

"Yes," replied Elvira, "and," with a glance at Lizzie, "I wouldn't be here now if Mr. Marshall hadn't made me."

"Oh, mumma," protested Margery, "I wanted to come."

"You hush up, Margery! What I came for is that Mr. Marshall would like to have the three of you come to our house for Thanksgiving dinner."

Lydia suddenly giggled. "Don't worry, Mrs. Marshall, we can't come. We're going to have company ourselves for Thanksgiving."

Elvira gave a huge sigh of relief. "Well, that's too bad," she said. "We're going to have a grand dinner, too."

"So are we," retorted Lydia.

"How's Florence Dombey?" asked Margery. "Mamma, can't I stay and play with Lydia a while?"

"We'll stay a few minutes," said Elvira, loosing her furs and settling back in her chair. "It's a real small place, Lizzie, but you can do so little work now, I s'posa it's just as well."

Lydia had produced a pasteboard shoe box of paper dolls which she gave to Margery. She cuddled Florence Dombey in her arms and gave one ear to Margery's questions as to the names and personalities of the paper dolls, the other to Elvira's comments.

"It ain't so small," sniffed Lizzie. "It's bigger'n anything you ever lived in, Elvira, till Dave sold enough lumber he stole from the government to start a bank."

"Land, Lizzie, don't be so cross," said Elvira. "I suppose you've heard the talk about John Levine? He's getting in with that half-breed crowd up on the reservation that the Indian agent's such friends with. They say Levine's land hungry enough to marry a squaw. He's so dark, I wouldn't be surprised if he had Indian blood himself. Land knows nothing would surprise me about him. They say he's just naturally crooked."

Lydia and Florence Dombey suddenly stood in front of Elvira.

Overdoing?

Hurry, Worry and Overwork Bring Heavy Strain.

MODERN life throws a heavy burden on our bodily machinery. The eliminative organs, especially the kidneys, are apt to become sluggish. Retention of excess urie acid and other poisonous waste often gives rise to a dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning perfectly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. More and more people are learning to assist their kidneys by the occasional use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Ask your neighbor!

THE DANGER LINE

The years in a man's life from thirty to fifty represent his period of greatest accumulation, his ability to earn and, if he will, save the most. At this time, success or failure is settled. It is plainly the case of "now or never." Don't you make the mistake so many make, and let the fiftieth year in your life find you without a savings reserve. After that, it is too late,—the time too limited. Save when you can afford to save and use this bank as a depository.

DEER SAFE IN EMMET COUNTY

Conservation Order Puts A Stop to Hunting Them For Five Years

Orders from the state conservation board close Emmet county to deer hunters for a five year period from November 15, 1926. Bliss township was closed to hunters of wild animals or birds for a five year period from October 25, 1925.

Among the lakes closed for a one year period, because mature small-mouthed bass had been planted in the waters and it was decided to give them a chance to reproduce before allowing them to be caught, was Douglas Lake in Cheboygan county.

A report, presented by David R. Jones of Petoskey, chief deputy of the department of conservation, surprised the members at a recent board meeting by the extent of illegal trapping carried on in Michigan, which he disclosed.

Federal investigators, working under authority, granted them through the Lacey Act are checking the books of every raw fur dealer in America, to determine if there has been any international or interstate traffic, in illegal furs and plumage.

From this source the Michigan Department of Conservation has reveiwed more than 200 cases involving the illegal possession and trapping of fur bearing animals by Michigan operators, covering muskrat, beaver, mink, fisher, otter and martin, 151 of these cases having already come to trial, with no acquittals.

The Odd Fellows will give a dance on Friday evening of this week.—Adv. 42-t1.

"An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." Campbell's shoes will fit your feet and keep your feet fit.—Adv. 42t1.

The Moose Lodge will give a Harvest dance at the Lakeside pavilion on Wednesday evening, October 27. Good music and good time guaranted. Bill $1.00, extra ladies 25c. —Adv. 42t1.

METHODIST CHURCH

"Printer's Ink"—sermon, Sunday 10:30 a. m. Hear about a family of fifteen, all preachers, who preach everywhere.

"Can The Great Law Be Enforced" Sunday evening forum, 7:30. A great debate on the above question between Rev. R. N. Holsaple, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Michigan, and Walter A. Rice, the League's attorney. This will be a union of all the churches of this city, and every citizen is invited. W. V. Waltman of Detroit writes of this debate as follows: "Concerning the debate I can only say that it is one of the most powerful presentations of the question of law enforcement ever undertaken. It is a gripping, thrilling nnd instructive drnma which holds the interest of the nudience from start to finish. It answers nll the arguments of the wets nganist Prohibition, points out the responsibility of the public officinls for the enforcement of the law and the responsibility of the privnte citizen and the need of his backing up the public official in order to secure proper law enforcement." No one can afford to miss the great debate next Sunday evening. Free to all. Every church is urged to attend.

Sunday school next Sunday at twelve o'clock. The school will study the elements of success in life.

Epworth League at 6:30 next Sunday. A great crowd of splendid youth attend these Sunday evening meetings. All young people nre welcome.

The ladies of the M. E. Literary nnd Sewing Club will serve a supper at the M. E. church, Fridny evening, October 29th, from 5:30 until nll nre served. Price 25 nnd 50 cents.—Adv. 42-t2.

Low Cost Battery Service

Nine times out of ten, the death of a battery comes as a surprise and a shock to its owner. Out of sight, it has been out of mind. And so when it suddenly refuses to respond, like a dog to it's master's whistle, the latter feels entitled to a grievance.

Buy a Willard Battery

No wood anywhere in this battery. Nine less parts. Case and partitions are made from high grade new rubber stock and molded by heat and pressure into a single unit of iron hardness. Acid has no effect on it. Zero weather will not cause it to crack. It will give more use and stand more abuse than any other known battery made. Equip your car with a Williard.

Time to think of winter storage. Bring your batteries to us. If it needs an overhauling, we will make it as good as new.

Hoot Gibson in "Spook Ranch." Hoot Gibson says: Folks, Ive been in a lot of westerns, but Spook Ranch has 'em all topped. I never worked with a livelier, peppier outfit in my life than this cast. And the bronchs—how they could buck and rare! The boys sure had to do some tall ridin' to stick to those horses. Everything in the picture was filled with fire and snap—the gun play, the punch scenes, the rickety-split riding, and the spook stuff that gave it an entirely new twist. They all say it's a whale of a picture—the best yet—so naturally I want all my old fan friends to see it.

Also "Felix The Cat" and a good comedy.

Eastern Branch of Maytag Company Sets a World Record

The Eastern Branch (headquarters in Philadelphia) of the Maytag Company of Newton, Iowa, has set a world's record in merchandising.

This branch has just received the largest individual shipment of merchandise ever known. Five solid trainloads. 130 carloads. More than 21,000 Maytag Aluminum Washers valued at $2,000,000.00.

This great shipment was routed over five different railroads in order to insure delivery. These five special trains identified by posters and banners were given clear right of way over the various roads and were met at various points along the route by prominent men and city officials.

It is stated by members of the sales ogranization of the Eastern Branch that every washer in this mammoth shipment will be disposed of in less than thirty days.

Trainload shipments of Maytag washers have not been uncommon the last few months. Three trainloads have been sent into California. Three trainloads into the Pacific Northwest and a trainload into Western Pennsylvania.

The daily production of Maytag washers at the fastory has already reached the astounding figure of 1250. This number will soon be increased by three or four hundred a day upon the completion of additional factory buildings now under construction. Among these buildings is a new aluminum foundry, credited with being one of the largest aluminum foundries in the world.

Sales of the Maytag washer have shown a decided increase, particularly during the last few years. With sales of but $1,000,000.00 in 1920 the total sales of last year reached the $35,000,000.00 mark. During the first eight months of the present year an increase of more than 60 per-cent has been reached which should bring the total sales for 1926 well above the $50,000,000.00 mark.

The Maytag company builds but one product—the Maytag Aluminum washer—and was founded more than thirty years ago by F. L. Maytag, the present chairman of the board of directors.

in the performance of judicial duty, are giving us thousands of precedents—one hundred and seventy-five thousand pages of decisions in a single year, an average of twelve thousand or more statutes and thirteen thousand or more permanently recorded decisions of highest courts each year. In the one hundred and thirth-nine years since the adoption of the constitution, congress has enacted fifty thousand laws, an average of nearly seven hundred and twenty-five for each of the sixty-nine congresses, and of these only forty-nine laws, or a little less than one-tenth of one per cent, have been held unconstitutional by the supreme court of the United States. There is a recital of some of the utterly foolish laws which are on the statute books. Former secretary of state Huges said, at one time, that as the result of the greatest law factories of the world this country was the victim of "prolixity, uncertainly and confusion." It would seem as if this country is more determined to make laws than to enforce laws. It is only by the enforcement of laws that respect for law can be maintained.

TAKES REAL SALESMANSHIP

Because of the big profits, the unlimited field, short working hours, there has been attracted to the fraternity of "doorbell ringers" a galaxy of real salesmen. It is a mistake to underestimate their ability, as many a business and professionl man can bear testimony after having arrived home at the end of the day to find that his wife had fallen victim to some oily-tongued, individual with something to sell.

All of us have a naturnl suspicion of the man who knocks at our door and asks us to listen to his sales talk. It takes real salesmaoship under such a handicap for him to make a sale. The firm that invades this territory and reaps a rich harvest without having the responsibility and cost of maintaining this community, can well afford to put good salesmen out on the road to dispose of their products. It is for that very reason that we should discourage the peddler by refusing to invest in his propositions. Every dollar we spend with him goes out of the community and never a cent of it returned, while a good portion of the money spent with the home merchant remains to enlarge and enrich the place where we live.

Unless we spend our money at home we cannot hope to achieve community success. It is time that we learned this simple lesson of economy. Your home merchant will give you better value for your dollar, and therefore should be your first consideration.

IMMIGRATION STATISTICS

The commissioner of immigration announces that in the first month of the new fiscal yenr beginning July 1, 1926, a total of 38,389 aliens entered the United States. Only 22,283 of these were classified as immigrants, the balance being tourists or other temporary visitors. During the same month 25,022 aliens left the United States, 17,970 being returning visitors or aliens going to some foreign country for a short stay, the other 7,052 classified as emigrants, leaving to make homes abroad again. While the admissions in July were below the monthly average for the past fiscal year, the departures this month exceeded the average for that period. During the last fiscal year aliens were admitted at the rate of 41,342 a month and departed at the rate of 18,980 a month. The bulk of the immigrant aliens admitted during July last came from the countries on the Western Hemisphere, with Canada and Mexico leading the list by far. These two countries, with 7,239 and 5,726 respectively, contributed more than one-half of the total for the month. Germany sent 1,613 immigrant aliens in the same period; 1,612 came from the Irish Free State; 1,300 from Great Britian, and 1,160 from Italy. Less than 400 came from any one of the other countries. Of the 7,052 emigrant aliens departed in July, 1926, over 80 per cent, or 5,708 went to Europe. Italy, with 1,442, received the largest number, followed by England with 689, and Greece with 419.

NATIONALISM

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation to give mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Our commercial policy should hold an equal and important hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preference;—Washington's Farewell Address.

GOOD RAILROADING

There was a period, not so fnr away, when Americnns were discouraged about their railroads. Many, though with no liking for government operation and little faith in it, wondered whether there was any other remedy. Now it develops that no remedy is needed.

The railroads have tackled their big problems again with the same vigor and confidence that they did in an older generation. Once, with unexampled courage and foresight, they built transportation lines for a great empire. Now they are carrying the freight of that empire with notable success, in quantities such as the old railroad builders never dreamed of.

OUR GREAT "LAW" FACTORIES

According to the nationnl budget committee the average law abiding citizen of this country today must observe about two million statutes and in addition the entire common law of England, as understood in 1776, excepting in so fnr as congress has modified this common law by legislation. An extremely interesting artical on this subject appeared in the New York Hernld - Tribune on Sunday, September 12th, written by Walter Hart Blumenthal. It is well worth reading. The author points out that we have in this country the greatest law factory the world has ever known. Forty-eight states and the federal government are turning out each year thousands of new laws, while at the same time the courts,

"Don't you say such things about Mr. Levine," said Lydia slowly, cheeks bright, eyes as blue as Florence Dombey's.

"Well!" exclaimed Elvira, beginning to pull her furs up, "I don't seem to be able to please you two with my conversation, so I'll be going. Margery, get up off that dirty floor. I never cared much about Amos' wife, she was too proud, but at least she was clean. She'd turn over in her grave if she knew what this house looked like. Come, Margery, the horse will be cold, standing so long."

Lizzie opened her mouth to speak but Lydia shook her head, and the two stood in silence, watching the departure of the visitors. When the door had closed Lizzie burst forth in an angry tirade, but Lydia only half listened. She looked slowly around the living room, then walked into the dining room and thence into the kitchen. She opened the pantry door and stared at the dust and disorder, the remnants of food, the half-washed dishes.

She came slowly back into the living room. Old Lizzie was replenishing the stove, still muttering to herself. Lydia observed for the first time that her apron was dirty. Thinking it over, she could not recall ever having seen Lizzie with a clean apron. A deep sense of shame suddenly enveloped Lydia.

"Oh, I wish someone had taught me," she groaned. "I wish mother had lived. Everybody has to go and die on me! I suppose Lizzie and dad'll be next. Adam helps to keep the house dirty. There's dog hair everywhere."

"Don't you get worked up over Elvira Marshall, child," said Lizzie.

"I hate her," exclaimed Lydia, "but what she said about the house is true. Anyhow, I've learned how to clean pantry shelves, so here goes."

She tied one of Lizzie's aprons round her neck, pushed a chair into the pantry and began her unsavory task. It was dusk when she finished and led Lizzie out to observe the shiny, sweet smelling orderliness of the place.

"Land, it does make a difference! If the rheumatiz didn't take all the ambition out of me, I'd keep it that way for you," said the old lady.

"I'll do it every Saturday. Gosh, I'm tired!" groaned Lydia, throwing herself on the living room couch. "Lizzie, give me some of your mutton tallow to rub on my hands. The cooking teacher says it's fine for hands."

The highly satisfactory Thanksgiving feast was eaten and praised. The dishes were washed and set away in the immaculate pantry, and Amos and John Levine were standing by the fire.

"Seems to me this room looks all slicked up," said Levine.

Amos nodded. "Lydia's coming along. Place was like a cyclone this morning for an hour, but the result pays. She's growing like her mother."

"She's only a child, and small for her age, at that," said John. "It's a shame for her to work so hard."

"I know it," answered Amos, "but what can I do? On a dollar and a half a day—I swan——"

There was a rap on the door. Lizzie admitted Dave Marshall and Margery.

"Out for a tramp as a digestor," explained Dave. "Came to call on my friend Lydia. I ain't seen her for ages."

He and Levine nodded to each other. Amos shook hands and Dave kissed Lydia, catching a dark scowl on Levine's face as he did so.

"Let's play paper dolls," said Margery, as soon as she had pulled off her coat.

"You play 'em," replied Lydia. "I'm awful tired."

"Why should a baby like you be tired?" inquired Marshall, pulling her to his side as he seated himself in Amos' armchair.

"If you'd tasted our dinner," said Amos, "you'd know why she and Lizzie should be half dead."

"I wish I could 'a' tasted it," replied Marshall. "Have a smoke, friends?"

Amos took a cigar but Levine refused.

"Come, John, come," said the stout banker, banteringly. "This is a legal holiday and you and I at least agree on Lydia. Let's stop war for the day, eh?"

Levine's sallow face hardened, then he caught Lydia's shine gaze on him as she stood beside Marshall. It was such a transparent, trusting gaze, so full of affection, so obviously appealing to him to "be nice," that in spite of himself he grinned and took a cigar.

Amos settled back with a sigh of satisfaction. He enjoyed company and had had no one but John since his wife's death.

"Co-ee! Lydia!" came a call from the lake shore.

Lydia ran to the kitchen door. Charlie Jackson and Kent were skating up to the bank.

"Come out for a while," cried Kent.

"I can't. I've got company. Come on up and get warm," returned Lydia.

The two boys slipped off their skates and came up to the cottage. Kent needed no introduction, and Lydia made short work of Charlie by saying to the assemblage at large, "This is Charlie Jackson. Come on up by the stove, boys."

The boys established themselves on the couch back of the basburner.

"Hello, Marg," said Kent. "What you doing?"

"Paper dolls," returned Margery from her corner, without looking up. Charlie Jackson stared at the beautiful little black head bent over the bright-colored bits of paper with interest.

Amos took up the conversation. "If we could get a Republican congress, that block o' pine and black loam twenty miles north would be given to its rightful owners."

"Meaning the full bloods, I suppose," said Levine with a short laugh.

"Yes — full-blooded whites," returned Amos.

Charlie Jackson suddenly threw back his head and rose.

"I'm a full-blood Indian," he said, quietly. The three men looked at him as if they saw him for the first time.

"Well, what of it?" asked Marshall, shortly.

"This of it," said Charlie, tensely, "that you whites with your Constitution and your Declaration of Independence are a lot of liars and thieves."

Marshall turned purple, but John Levine spoke quickly. "Easy there, my boy! You're talking of things you don't understand."

"Oh, but he does," interrupted Lydia eagerly. "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.' We had it in school. It must mean Indians, too."

John Levine laughed. "There you have it. And Charlie is right, we are liars and thieves, but we have to be. Might is right in this world."

"Spunk for yourself, Levine," cried Marshall.

"Levine?" exploded Charlie. "Are you Levine? You're the man then that my sister—" his voice rose to a shout. "I'll beat the face off of you right now."

And he made a sudden spring for the astonished Levine

A VOTER'S LAMENT

OR

The (S)wearing of the Green

* * * * * * * * * *

The funniest 'lection ever heard
Was held the other day;
For morning came with bright blue skies
That turned at night to gray.
It rained and rained and was so dark
No stars at night were seen,
But gosh, when votes were gathered in
The durned things all turned Green.

The ballots used were all pure white
And printed nice you know,
With deep black ink on paper light with tints of bluish hue.
Small squares were put before the names
You'd cross when' hind the screen;
But gosh it's funny how they changed
The durned things all turned Green.

'Most every fall about this time
The leaves are brown and gold;
You shiver every single night
When chill air makes you cold.
But this year it is different now.
The trees are bright and clean;
Strange thing, you know, at 'lection time
The durned things all turned Green.

When but a kid I 'member well
How things just used to be
At 'lection time long in the fall,
The demmycrats you'd see
A-calling 'publicans as black—
A-ventin' out their speen;
This year they surely changed their coats—
The durned things all turned Green.

At Lansing Alex was our king
An' purple robes he'd wear;
With thinning locks and priestly mein
Sat in his royal chair.
He ruled 'em with an iron hand
His enemies grew less;
And now the royal robes have changed
The durned things all turned Green.

Now yellow is the golden sun,
An' blue is of the skies;
An' pink the color girls all wear
In ribbons 'round their eyes;
An' red and scarlet, grey and tan
An' brown and stripes are seen;
Till now the rainbow has all changed
The durned things all turned Green.

Why it takes fifty years to make a shoe as good as this

This is a good-looking shoe. You can buy other shoes, nearly as good-looking, from any good manufacturer. It will take fifty years to make a shoe as good as this, for the Walk-Over inbuilt quality, uncopyable wear, fit, and comfort of this shoe are something that only fifty years of keeping faith with quality can put into good-looking shoes.

When you buy shoes, consider the Quality. The world is full of Cheap, trashy Footwear.

ANNUAL MEETING TEACHERS' ASSN.

To Be Held At Petoskey, October 21 and 22

The Charlevoix public schools will be closed on Thursday and Friday of this week, so that the teachers may attend the meeting of the 5th district of the Michigan Education Association at Petoskey.

The program calls for many splendid talks, special lectures, banquets and dinners.

High lights on the program will be the three general sessions Thursday morning, evening and Friday afternoon. These will be closed to the public because of lack of space at the Baptist church where the meetings will he held. Harry Olson, chief justice of the Municipal court of Chicago, speaks Thursday morning at 10 while in the evening, Tom Skeyhill, Australian war hero will lecture. Friday afternoon the speaker will be Ellwood P. Cubbedly, dean of the school of education of LeLand Stanford university.

The divisional meetings, also will have their special speakers from among the great educators of the land. Among these will be President K. L. Butterfield, of Michigan State college.

The ladies of the M. E. Literary and Sewing Club will serve a supper at the M. E. church, Friday evening, October 29th, from 5:30 until all are served. Price 25 and 50 cents.—Adv. 42-t2.

DEBATE SHED LIGHT ON TIMELY SUBJECT

Question of Prohibition Enforcement Shown From All Angles

The debate put on last Sunday evening at the Methodist church between Supt. Holsaple of the State Anti Saloon League and Walter A. Rice, the league's attorney, was an interesting "dramatic" affair, showing up the question of prohibition law enforcement from all angles.

The Anti Saloon League of Michigan is not under fire regarding either its finances or methods. A public statement is made every year showing where every penny is expended. A board of responsible business men tends the policy of the organization.

The Anti Saloon League is the only way the churches of the state have to function, to present a united front to the A. A. P. A. and other wet organizations. And the annual visitation made in each community for funds is an occasion to forget denominational lines and get together in the interest of a common cause.

CHARLEVOIX TIES HARBOR SPRINGS

DISPLAY BETTER FOOTBALL THAN IN PREVIOUS GAMES

Will Meet Undefeated Petoskey Team There Next Saturday—Want Good Turn-Out

Coach Buchen's C. H. S. football eleven showed improvement in all departments of the game last Saturday and held the fust Harbor Springs eleven to a 7 to 7 tie.

The game opened with Charlevoix receiving Two off tackle plays were followed by a punt to Harbor's 30 yard line. Harbor failed to gain and on the fourth down her punt was blocked by McCann, giving the locals the ball on the 30 yard line. Higman made 4 yards off tackle. McCann's cross-buck netted 1st down and three more plays carried the ball to the 12 yard line. An incompleted pass made it 4th down with 8 yards to go. A well executed trick play took Harbor by surprise and Higman took the ball to the 1 yard line and the next play he carried it over for the locals lone score. McCann scored the extra point.

The game see-sawed throughout the second quarter with Charlevoix having a slight advantage. Harbor came back strong in the second half, pushing the locals back near their own goal, and with a short pass to tackle evened the count. Harbor again threatened to score in the last qunrter when they blocked a drop kick and romped nearly the full length of the field. Charlevoix punted out of danger and the game ended with Harbor in possession of the ball on Charlevoix 40 yard line.

Charlevoix played better football in all departments in last Saturday's game. McCann and Higman carried the ball for good gains and the defensive work of Cooper, Gill and Beaudoine was outstanding. The locals go to Petoskey Saturday.

LOCAL GIRL WED AT SOUTH BEND

Miss Eleanor Kolderhouse Now Mrs. Arthur J. Wick

The following news item, taken from the South Bend Tribune, will be of considerable interest to Charlevoix friends of the Kelderhouse family:

"The marriage of Eleanor Kelderhouse, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Kelderhouse of Charlevoix, Michignn, and Arthur J. Wick, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Wick of Dayton, Ohio, was solomnized in the parsonage of the First Christian church by Rev. Elmer Cole, Tuesday evening at 6:30 o'clock.

The attendants were Miss Josephine Feldman of Fort Wayne, Ind., and L. J. Schubert of this city.

"The couple left for a short honeymoon and will be at home to their friends after the 23rd, in their apartment,322 West Madison. Mr. Wick is connected with the Northwestern Finance Company of this city."

Mrs. Wick is a former Charlevoix high school student and is very well known in this city. Her many friends extend congratulations.

12TH ANNUAL INSPECTION TOUR

PARTY TO COVER ENTIRE NORTHERN DIVISION

Will Make Review of Work Accomplished During Year and Recommend Numerous Changes

The twelfth annual inspection tour of the Pere Marquette Railway lines, with President Frank H. Alfred, and a party of general and divisional officers, arrived at Petoskey during the night of Tuesday, and are making the inspection of the line between that point and Grand Rapids, this being the third day of an itinerary that comprises nine days. The lines on the western side of the state have been gone over this week. Thursday, they will be in Canada, crossing at Port Huron that evening and resuming the tour through the lines in the Thumb district on Friday. The party will disband at Saginaw that evening over the week end. The inspection will close on Thursday, October 28th.

Traveling with President Alfred are a number of the "front office" heads, including Messrs. C. S. Sikes, vice-president and general auditor; Seward L. Merriam, general counsel; A. L. Grandy, assistant to the president; E. E. Cain, assistant to the president; A. E. Badger, general superintendent; A. J. Minard, assistant general superintendent; E. D. Hawley, superintendent of transportation; H. O. Halsted, superintendent of car service; R. P. Paterson, general freight agent; John Dunphy, general passenger agent; R. J. Williams, superintendent motive power; C. K. Wood, assistant superintendent motive power; F. L. Oliver, superintendent of parlor and dining cars; R. A. Kirkpatrick, general claim agent; W. J. Hargis, superintendent of freight claims and a number of divisional officers, these latter accompanying the train over their particular district.

Throughout the inspection the general offices of the railroad are virtually "on wheels", the train being in constant telegraphic communication with the head offices and a corps of secretaries being kept fairly busy throughout.

Since the inception of these intensive annual inspections, a certain spirit of friendly rivalry among the men in the various departments has been aroused which is carried over through the year. Incidentally, the inspection is so timed as to enable the officers to view the new work that has been carried on during the summer months and it also affords a prospective of what will be required for the period of difficult winter operation. So, in this way, the general officers contend that the inspection tour serves several purposes.

The train consists of three office cars, a dinning car, a sleeper and an especially constructed inspection car having an open amphitheatre in the rear.

Another Real Estate Deal Turned

Charles Hamlin and Joe Foster, co-partners, have exchanged their holdings consisting of 96 acres of shore frontage, lying one mile south of Norwood, to H. B. Parry, of Detroit, for what is known as the Emrey block, occupied for many years by the Emrey Clothing Store. The deal was made Saturday.

COURT CLOSES 2-DAY SESSION

UNUSUAL SEARS CASE HELD OVER TO NEXT TERM

Ono Liquor Law Violator Draws Heavy Fino—Many Divorce Cases on Docket

The October term of circuit court opened on Monday, the 25th, with Judge Guy E. Smith of Gladwin, Mich., presiding in the absence of Judge Parm C. Gilbert, who is now on his vacation. A large number of non-jury cases were disposed of and the session cleaned up a number of other cases. Court adjourned Tuesday afternoon after two days of activity.

In the case of the People vs. Leo Fettig, charged with violation of the liquor law, respondent pleaded guilty to the charge as read and was sentenced by the court to pay a fine of $150.00 and costs of $100.00; and in default of such payment serve from six months to one year in the Ionia reformatory, with a recommendation of six months.

Lucius Founce and Rufin Richarcheck pleaded guilty to the charge of breaking and entering and were placed on probation for a period of two years under the custody of Chas. Novak. The conditions of their probation contained other strict rules.

In the case of the People vs. Rosco Bancroft, charged with larceny, respondent pleaded guilty to the charge. Bancroft had already served 60 days in the county jail while awaiting sentence and was released by the court.

Merton Allen was found guilty of non-support and was ordered by the court to furnish bonds as a guarantee of payments for the support of his wife and child.

The case of the People vs. Grace Robert Cotton Sears and William Hurbert Sears, charged with mutilating public records, respondents entered a plea of not guilty and the case was adjourned to the next term of court. This case, on account of its unusual nature has attracted considerable attention.

A large number of divorce cases were disposed of and a number of others adjourned until the next session of court.

WORK STARTED ON ANOTHER COTTAGE

Beautiful Bungalow Under Construction for Capt. Partridge

It was just a few issues back that we described the beautiful bungalow being completed at Boulder Park for people from Haines City, Florida, and now learn that Capt. F. C. Partridge is starting the building of a beautiful stone bungalow on lot No. 2 at Boulder Park.

This bungalow is to be stone construction of faced hardheads and the stone contract has been let to Thomas Russell. W. E. Parmelee has the contract for the carpenter work. Because of the unusually fine lot this cottage is situated on and the type of stone work used it promises to be one of the most attractive cottages so far erected in the subdivision.

CHARLES DEARBORNE FOUND DEAD FRIDAY

Prominent Antrim County Farmer Found Dead Near Central Lake

Charles S. Dearborn, a pioneer resident of Forest Home township and one of Antrim county's leading farmers was found dead on his barn floor, last Friday morning. Mr. Dearborne was found by S. S. Sigler of Central Lake, who had gone to the Dearborne farm on business that day.

According to Mr. Sigler, he called at the Dearborn farm about 8 o'clock Friday morning and inquired of Mrs. Dearborn where her husband was and she told him that he was at the potato field where several men were employed digging potatoes. Upon further inquiries, he was not at the field, Mr. Sigler than went to the barn where he found him lying on the floor near his car, dead.

Evidently Mr. Dearborn had been trying to start his car and was suddenly taken with a heart attack. When found, it is believed that he had been dead about an hour.—Central Lake Torch.

DISTRICT W.R.C. CONVENTION HERE

HELD SUCCESSFUL TWO-DAY CONVENTION LAST WEEK

Business Transacted and Officers Elected—Next Annual Meeting at Traverse City

Fifty-six delegates from 13 crops of the 12th district Womens' Relief Corps met as guests of the local corps in the Moose hall here last Wednesday and Thursday, elected officers and transacted business of their annual meeting.

The 12th district embraces that part of the lower peninsula between Mackinaw City and Traverse City on the west and Cheboygan and Mancelona on the east. The program included business meetings during the two days and a Campfire meeting at the Methodist church on the night of the 20th. The city was resplendant with the national colors in honor of the occasion.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were as follows:

President, Mrs. Wagner, Traverse City.

Senior vice-president, Mrs. Rose Kibbe, Charlevoix.

Junior vice-president, Mrs. Wheaton, Cheboygan.

Chaplain, Mrs. Martha Staley, Wolverine.

Secretary, Mrs. Leota Powers, Harbor Springs.

Treasurer, Mrs. Montgomery, Petoskey.

Conductor, Mrs. Eva Norton, Wolverine.

Asst. Conductor, Sadic Olson, Traverse City.

Guard, Mrs. Adeline Bellinger, Charlevoix.

Asst. Guard, Charlotte Wakefield, Charlevoix.

The meetings adjourned Thursday after what was termed a very successful convention. The local corps received due praise for the splendid manner in which they entertained visiting delegates. It was voted to hold the next annual meeting at Traverse City.

JAMES WYERS BUYS CHARLEVOIX GARAGE

Will Handle Three Car Agencies and Have Repair Department

The Charlevoix Garage, corner of State and Antrim street, owned by Brown & Wallace, was sold Monday to James Wyers, who took immediate possession.

Mr. Wyers takes over the agencies for Willys-Knight, Overland, Hudson-Essex and Chrysler automobiles and will maintain a repair shop with Will Myers in charge. Mr. Myers will move his equipment from O'Neil's bus and taxi building, where he has been located for the past year or more, to the new location. Mr. Wyers has been in the car selling game for a number of years and Mr. Myers is considered an A-1 repair man. Their new venture should meet with success.

DIED AFTER BEING STRUCK BY AUTO

WAS VISITING HER GRANDCHILDREN AT ROYAL OAK

Mrs. Mossington Numbered Among Charlevoix's Earliest Pioneer Residents

The sudden death of Mrs. Charles Mossington, who left here only a little over a week ago to visit her grandchildren at Royal Oak, Mich., came as a great surprise to Charlevoix citizens and will bring forth many expressions of real grief, and it will cause deep and sincere regret among the many who knew and honored her.

Mrs. Mossington left Charlevoix a week ago last Thursday for Royal Oak, where she had expected to spend the winter with her grandchildren. Sunday evening, at about 6:30, while out for a walk with members of the family, she was run down and struck by an automobile while crossing the street at an intersection. She was immediately rushed to a hospital, where she died thirty-five minutes later, never regaining consciousness, the cause of death being cerebral hemorrhage and shock.

Mrs. Mossington and her husband, who died less than a year ago, numbered among the early settlers of this vicinity, coming here from Canada in 1880. She was 74 years old at the time of death, and was born in Sinco county, Canada, in 1852. She is survived by one daughter, Mrs Harry widdifield and seven grand-children. A son Wellington, died 8 years ago.

The body was brought to Charlevoix by her daughter and grandson, Kenneth Widdifield, and funeral services were held from the Widdifield residence last Thursday afternoon, Rev. B. G. Mattson of the Congregational church officiating. Interment at Brookside.

Mrs. Mossington was greatly devoted to her church and was one of the earliest members of the Congregational church, having been a member before the present edifice was built. She was of a kind and sunny disposition and loved by everyone, and one cannot help but feel that the violence of her death in Royal Oak was far out of keeping with her kind and gentle nature. Life is not measured by years alone, but by thoughts and deeds, and by this measure Mrs. Mossington has lived a full and beautiful life.

WILL KEEP OPEN 5650 MILES OF ROAD

State Highway Department Extends Its Program

The state administrative board last Thursday approved a radical extension of the snow removal program of the Michigan state highway department. This program calls for keeping open 5,650 miles of state trunk lines this coming winter. This is an addition of 1,300 miles over last winter.

Up until Februrary the state made no effort to keep trunk lines open north of Ludington, Reed City and Bay City. Beginning in Februrary, however, an effort was made to clear the snow from M11, M13 and M10 all the way to Mackinaw City. Results proved so satisfactory, in spite of the fact that too late a start was made in the case of M13, that the program was extended far this coming winter.

Even upper peninsula roads are included on the list, among them M12, M15, M35 and M25. Sault Ste. Marie, which in the past has laid up its cars with the first heavy snow, will have an open road to the straits and to the western part of the upper peninsula unless unexpectedly heavy storms upset calculations of the highway maintenance division.

An interview with our county road commissioners resulted in little information as to what will be done locally in regrads to keeping the roads open, as they have received no instructions to date from the state highway department.

The ladies of the M. E. Literary and Sewing Club will serve a supper at the M. E. church, Friday evening, October 29th, from 5:30 until all are served. Price 25 and 50 cents.—Adv. 42-t2.

THE art of making meals attractive is in serving flavory foods.

In breakfast oats, see that you get the Quaker brand. The difference in flavor is amazing.

Some 50 years were spent perfecting Quaker flavor. No other oats offers it to you. Yet the price you pay is the same.

Quaker milling, too, retains much of the "bulk" of oats. And that makes laxatives less often needed. Protein, carbohydrates and vitamines and "bulk" are thus combined in making Quaker Oats an excellently balanced ration.

Shirley Mason in "Free Lance" Role

Acceptance of n featured role in First National's new production, "What Fools Men," was Shirley Mason's first net on her liberation from a contract which for the last five years has given her services exclusively to William Fox.

Miss Mason likes the sensation of being able to choose or reject whatever material is tendered her so well that she has decided to remain a free lance. She refused to affix her signature to several nice, long-term contracts offered her by producers and took her time—some two months—to decide among some seven roles offered her on the new basis, finally picking the First National role as presenting her most auspiciously in her new "free lance" guise.

"What Fools Men" is booked for the Palace theatre next Wednesday and Thursday.

Rex Beach Novel is Screened Here

Rex Beach's thrilling novel of the Alaskan gold rush has finally been brought to the screen. Frank Lloyd, who gave us "The Sea Hawk" and other fine screen dramatics, was the producer as well as director, with First National sponsoring the production. Will open at the Palace theatre Saturday and Sunday.

Anna Q. Nilsson, Viola Dana, Ben Lyon, Victor McLaglen, Hobert Bosworth, Claude Gillingwater, Dorothy Sebastian, Charles Crockett, Fred Kohler, Philo McCollough, John T. Murray, Fred Warren, Tom London, J. G. Davis, Wade Boteler and Larry Fisher are among the principal members of the large cast and in some of the scenes several thousands of character extras, including more than 150 of the real Alaskan sourdoughs of gold rush days appear.

Scenes have been made in frozen river beds and atop a mountain range at an elevation of 9,800 feet and the scenic backgrounds for the exterior action are of unusual splendor.

PONTIAC SIX $825 SEDAN or COUPE

You need to drive a Pontiac Six for only thirty minutes to discover abilities and qualities absolutely unique at the price.

You experience a mastery of performance once undreamed of in any low-cost six—acceleration that borders on the sensational, lugging power and sustained high speed capacity that would be impossible save for the fact that the Pontiac Six engine is the largest six-cylinder power plant used in any car costing less than $1000.

Yet, unprecedented as they are, these performance results only typify the pronounced over-all superiority that has made Pontiac Six such a spectacular success from the day of its presentation.

In the beauty of its Fisher bodies, in its supreme roadability, in its economy of operation and its unfailing stamina, the Pontiac Six represents a decisive departure from the standards that once ruled in the field of low-cost sixes——a fact that you can prove to your own satisfaction by a thirty minute drive—at any time, under any condition.

LYDIA of the Pines

by HONORÉ WILLSIE

W.N.U. SERVICE COPYRIGHT by FREDERICK A. STOKES CO.

CHAPTER VII

The Republican Candidate

Amos and Kent caught Charlie by either arm as his hands clutched for Levine's throat. Marshall did not stir out of his chair. During the remainder of the episode his face wore a complacent expression that, though Lydia did not consciously observe it at the time, returned to her in after years with peculiar significance.

"Here! Here! This won't do, my young Indian!" cried Amos.

"Let me get at him!" panted Charlie.

Lydia ran over to the Indian.

"Charlie," she pleaded, looking up into his face, "you mustn't hurt Mr. Levine. He's my best friend. And it is not polite to come to call at my house and make a row, this way."

"That's right," commented Marshall. "Do your fighting outdoors."

John had not stirred from his chair. He looked up at the Indian and said slowly and insolently, "Get out of here! You know what I can do to you, don't you? Well, get out before I do it!"

Charlie returned John's look of contempt with one of concentrated hatred. Then he turned to Kent.

"Come on, Kent," he growled and followed by his friend, he marched out of the kitchen door.

"Whew!" said Amos, "talk about civilizing Indians!"

Lydia was trembling violently. "What made him act so— Did you hurt his sister, Mr. Levine?"

"Didn't even know he had a sister," returned John, coolly relighting his cigar.

Marshall rose and stretched his fat body. "Well, you serve up too much excitement for me, Amos. I'll be getting along. Come Margery."

"Wait and we'll all have some coffee," said Lizzie. "Land, I'm all shook up."

"Pshaw! 'twan't anything. Kent should have had more sense than to bring him in here," said Levine.

"Why, he's usually perfectly lovely," protested Lydia. "Goes to parties with the girls and everything."

"First boy, white or Indian, that comes to call on you before you're eighteen, I'll turn the hose on," said Dave, winking at the men.

Amos and John laughed and Dave made his exit in high good humor.

When the door had closed Amos said: "Any real trouble with the boy, John?"

"Shucks, no!" returned Levine. "Forget it!"

And forget it they did while the November dusk drew to a close and the red eyes of the stove blinked a warmer and warmer glow. About eight o'clock, after a light supper, Levine started back for town. He had not been gone five minutes when a shot cracked through the breathless night air.

Amos started for the door but Lizzie grasped his arm. "You stay right here, Amos, and take care of the house."

"What do you s'pose it was?" whispered Lydia. "I wish Mr. Levine was here. He's sheriff."

"That's what I'm afraid of—that something's happened to him—between his being sheriff and his other interests. I'll get my lantern."

"Wait! I'll have to fill it for you," said Lydia.

So it was that while Amos fumed and Lydia sought vainly for a new wick, footsteps sounded on the porch, the door opened and Billy Norton and his father supported John Levine into the living-room. Levine's overcoat showed a patch of red on the right breast.

"For God's sake! Here, put him on the couch," gasped Amos.

"Billy, take Levine's bicycle and get the doctor here," said Pa Norton.

"Hot water and clean cloth, Lydia," said Amos. "Let's get his clothes off, Norton."

Lydia trembling violently could scarcely carry the crushed ice from Lizzie to her father. No one spoke until the gentle oozing of the blood yielded to the freezing process. Then Amos said in a low voice to Pa Norton:

"What happened?"

"Can't say. Billy and I were coming home from town when we heard the shot ahead of us. It took us a minute or two to come up to Levine. He was standing dazed like, said the shot had come from the lake shore way and that's all he knew about it."

The beat of horses' hoofs on the frozen ground broke the silence that followed. In a moment Doctor Fulton ran into the room. Lydia seized Florence Dombey and hurried to the kitchen, nor did she leave her station in the furthest corner until the door closed softly after the doctor. Amos came out into the kitchen and got a drink at the water pail.

"Doc got the bullet," said Amos. "Grazed the top of the lungs and came to the surface near the backbone. Lord, that was a narrow escape!"

"Who did it, daddy?"

Amos shook his head. "It might have been Charlie Jackson or it might have been a dozen others. A sheriff's liable to have plenty of enemies. Billy started a bunch hunting."

Lydia shivered.

"Doc got the bullet," said Amos.

Lydia, Coming Home From School With Adam.

"We're going to be busy in this house for a while."

"I want to see him first, please, daddy."

"Just a peek then, don't make a noise."

Already the living-room had a sick room aspect. The light was lowered and the table was littered with bandages and bottles. Lydia crept up to the couch and stood looking down at the gaunt, quiet figure.

John opened his eyes and smiled faintly. "Making you lots of trouble, young Lydia."

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Lydia. "Just get well, we don't mind the trouble."

"I've got to get well, so's you and I can travel," whispered Levine. "Good night, dear."

Lydia swallowed a sob. "Good night," she said.

The shooting was a seven days' wonder, but no clue was found as to the identity of the would-be assassin. Charlie Jackson had spent the evening with Kent. As the monotony of Levine's convalescence came on, gossip and conjecture lost interest in him. John himself would not speak of the shooting.

It was after Christmas before Lydia, coming home from school with Adam, who always went to meet her, would find John, pale and weak but fully dressed, watching for her from his arm-chair by the window. The two had many long talks, in the early winter dusk before Lydia started her preparations for supper. One of these particularly, the child never forgot.

"Everybody acted queer about Charlie Jackson, at first," said Lydia, "but now you're getting well, they're all just as crazy about him as ever."

"He'll kill some one in a football scrimmage yet," was John's comment.

"No, the boys say he never loses his temper. The rest of them do. I wish girls played football. I bet I'd make a good quarterback."

John laughed weakly but delightedly. "You must weigh fully a hundred pounds! Why, honey, they'd trample a hundred pounds to death!"

"They would not!" Lydia's voice was indignant. "And just feel my muscles. I get 'em from swimming."

John ran his hand over the proffered shoulders and arm. "My goodness," he said in astonishment. "Those muscles are like tiny steel springs. Well, what else would you like to be besides 'quarterback, Lydia?"

Lydia hitched her chair closer to Levine and glanced toward the kitchen where Lizzie was knitting and warming her feet in the oven. "I'd like to own an orphan asylum. And I'd get the money to run it with from a gold mine. I would find a mine in New Mexico. I know I could if I could just get out there."

"But what are you really going to do with yourself, Lydia, pipe dreams aside?"

"Well, first I'm going to get an education, clear up through the university. 'Get an education if you have to scrub the street to do it,' was what mother always said. 'You can be a lady and be poor,' she said, 'but you can't be a lady and use poor English.' And then I'm going to be as good a housekeeper as Mrs. Marshall and I'm going to dress as well as Olga Reinhardt, and have as pretty hands as Miss Towne. And I'm never going to move out of the home I make. Maybe I'll get married. I suppose I'll have to 'cause I want at least six children, and some one's got to support them. And I'll want to travel a good deal."

"Travel takes money," John reminded her.

By the middle of January, Levine was sufficiently recovered to leave. The Saturday before he left occurred another conversation between him and Lydia that cemented still further the quaint friendship of the two.

Lizzie was taking a long nap. The dear old soul had been exhausted by the nursing. Levine lay on the couch and finally asked Lydia to read aloud to him. She was deep in "The Old Curiosity Shop" and was glad to share it with her friend.

Suddenly Levine was astonished to hear Lydia's voice tremble. She was reading of little Nell's last sickness. "She was dead. Dear, patient, noble Nell was dead. No sleep so beautiful and calm. She seemed a creature fresh from the hand of God. Not one who had lived and suffered death."

Lydia suddenly broke off, bowed her yellow head on the book and broke into deep, long-drawn sobs that were more like a woman's than a child's.

John rose as quickly as he could. "My dearest!" he exclaimed. "What's the matter?" He pulled her from the arm chair, seated himself, then drew her to his knees.

"I can't bear it!" sobbed Lydia. "I can't. Seems sometimes if I couldn't have little Patience again I'd die! That's the way she looked in her coffin, you remember? 'Fresh from the hand of God not one who had lived and suffered death.' O my little, little sister!"

John gathered Lydia in his arms and hushed her against his heart.

"Sweetheart! Sweetheart! Why, I didn't realize you still felt so! Think how happy Patience must be up there with God and her mother! You wouldn't wish her back!"

"If I believed that I could stand it—but there isn't any God!"

Levine gasped. "Lydia! Hush now! Stop crying and tell me about it."

His sallow face was set with pain. Why, child, this isn't right. You're too young for such thoughts! Lydia, do you read the Bible?"

She nodded. "I've tried that, too—but Jesus might have believed everything He said was true, yet there mightn't have been a word of truth in it. Do you believe in God?"

John's hold on the thin hands tightened. He stared long and thoughtfully at the snowflakes sifting endlessly past the window.

"Lydia," he said, at last, "I'll admit that my faith in the hereafter and in an All-seeing God has been considerably shaken as I've grown older. But I'll admit, too, that I've refused to give the matter much thought. I tell you what I'll do. Let's you and I start on our first travel trip, right now! Let's start looking for God, together. He's there all right, my child. But you and I don't seem to be able to use the ordinary paths to get to Him. So we'll hack out our own trail, eh? And you'll tell me what your progress is—and where you get lost—and I'll tell you. It may take us years, but we'll get there, by Heck! Eh, young Lydia?"

Lydia looked into the deep black eyes long and earnestly. And as she looked there stole into her heart a sense of companionship, of protection, of complete understanding, that spread like a warm glow over her tense nerves. It was a sense that every child should grow up with, yet that Lydia had not known since her mother's death.

"Oh!" she cried, "I feel happier already. Of course we'll find Him. I'll begin my hunt tomorrow."

* * * * * * *

Amos was keenly interested in Levine's campaign. He took Lydia one September evening just before school opened to hear John make a speech in the square. Lydia up to this time had given little heed to the campaign, but she was delighted with the unwonted adventure of being away from home in the evening.

On the wooden platform extended from the granite steps of the capitol a band dispensed dance music and patriotic airs, breaking into "America" as Levine made his way to the front of the platform.

Lydia stared up at him. She was filled with pride at the thought of how close and dear he was to her. She wished that the folk about her realized that she and her shabby father were intimate with the hero of the evening.

The first part of the address interested Lydia very little. It concerned the possibility of a new post office for Lake City and made numerous excursions into the matter of free trade. Then of a sudden Levine launched his bolt.

"Ladies and gentlemen, twenty miles north of this old and highly civilized city lies a tract fifty miles square of primitive forest, inhabited by savages. That tract of land is as beautiful as a dream of heaven. Virgin pines tower to the heavens. Little lakes lie hid like jewels on its bosom. Its soil is black. Fur-bearing animals frequent it now as they did a century ago.

"Friends, in this city of white men there is want and suffering for the necessaries of life. Twenty miles to the north lies plenty for every needy inhabitant of the town, a bit of loam and heaven-kissing pines for each and all.

"But, you say, they belong to the Indians! Friends, they belong to a filthy, degenerate, lazy race of savages, who refuse to till the fields or cut the pines, who spend on whisky the money allowed them by a benevolent government and live, for the rest, like beasts of the field.

"Why, I ask you, should Indians be pampered and protected, while whites live only in the bitter air of competition?

"I am not mincing words tonight. I do not talk of taking the lands from the Indians by crooked methods. You all know the law. An Indian may not sell the lands allotted to him. I want you to send me to congress to change that law. I want the Indian to be able to sell his acreage."

Levine stopped and bowed. Pandemonium broke loose in the square. Clapping, hisses, cheers and catcalls. Lydia clung to her father's arm while he began to struggle through the crowd.

"Well," he said, as they reached the outer edge of the square and headed for the trolley, "the battle is on."

This was the beginning of Lydia's reading of the newspapers. To her father's secret amusement, she found the main details of Levine's battle as interesting as a novel. Every evening when he got home to supper he found her poring over the two local papers and primed with questions for him. Up to this moment she had lived in a quiet world bounded by her school, the home, the bit of lake shore and wood with which she was intimate, and peopled by her father and her few friends.

With John Levine's speech, her horizon suddenly expanded.

"We Serve Michigan"

This Railroad Plant of Ours and What it Means to You

AMERICAN railroads are hauling more freight than at any time in their history.

They have averaged over a million loaded cars per week during the current year.

This service consists in moving commodities from the point of production to the one of consumption.

It is a tremendous work that has been done and it establishes a new high transportation record for the world.

That service has been performed with regularity, uniformity and dispatch.

Through these, the business of the country has been given added impetus.

It has been estimated that through the improved service a saving of one and a half billions of dollars per annum has accrued to the people of the United States over the service that obtained in 1920.

This sum represents the advantages gained through the orderly manner in which our railroads are now functioning.

Our railroads have attained the highest record for the average daily movement of freight cars ever reached, and, likewise the best performance in use of fuel.

So much for the new record of the railroads of the United States.

THE plant, which comprises the railroads that serve Michigan's varied industries, has contributed its share in this proud national achievement, and in the saving of one and a half billions of dollars, through lessened inventories carried by our business institutions and made possible by the accelerated service. This has been achieved, too, while facilitating the even flow of production as well as the orderly diffusion of commodities.

Michigan has received great tangible benefits, since it is now a veritable beehive of industrial activity.

Michigan will continue to progress only so long as it's railroads continue to enjoy the undivided support of the communities they serve.

Michigan people, as a whole, farmer and manufacturer, preacher and teacher, office employee and laborer, are cashing in through this new outlook on transportation, so vital to the public weal and welfare. Our people will continue to cash in only so long as this understanding is maintained.

We have much to gain — the people and the railroads alike — in prolonging this understanding.

We can keep Michigan in the vanguard of economic importance only through the continued expansion of our industries and by keeping our railroads just ahead of the country's transportation needs.

LIFE AND RESPONSIBILITY

"Most of us hope to get rid of our worries some day.

"We live in that hope. We build on it. We picture to ourselves the happy hour when, free at last, we shall possess not a care on earth.

"Fortunately, very few of us realize that expectation. Worry remains, and work and usefulness continue. But there are exceptions to this rule. Every now and then a man really does lose his worries.

"The first thing which happens to a man when he loses his worries is a sense of bewilderment. He realizes that he is in a different world. It is new and unfamiliar—moreover, it is vague.

"The old, every-day clearly defined landmarks are there no longer. The urgency is there no longer. No longer is it possible to say to oneself: 'I must face that difficulty before the end of the week. By this time next year I may just have got my feet clear again.'

"The unworried man has clear feet. But, usually, he has nowhere to go. What does it matter where he goes? He can pay his way.

"And because he can do things without effort, he does none of them.

"A worried man, on the contrary, because he cannot do any of these things except at great cost, does them all.

"Mental worry bears some quite definite relationship to the seton of 50 years ago. It seems to act as a tonic for human nerves.

"It gives the worried man a sense of importance. 'What would happen if I should lose my life or my health?' That question is usually asked in accents of dispair, but it always proceeds from a heart that is full of eagerness, from a spirit assured of its value to its neighbors.

"In this sense even ill-health itself is a link with humanity. 'See how splendidly I struggle on in spite of my trouble.'

"We may doubt all this in the working months when worries are steadily perched on our doors or desks. But the holiday season reveals the truth to those who care to see it.

"Holidays are really periods of temporary escape from worry. They always look tremendously inviting beforehand. Most of us return from them with secret joy.

"We have had enough of the leisured ease which seemed so alluring. We want our worries again, and our humanity and our hopes and fears. The happiest month of the year is not August but October.

"It is a good thing and a interesting thing, to watch oneself on holiday and, if possible, to see how one responds to freedom from care. Alas, as a rule the conclusion is soon reached that when care flies out of the window boredom comes in at the door!

"The best holidays of all are those one takes in working hours. They are the only holidays which carry with them their own anxiety. That may be bad morality; it is good medicine."

FIVE-DAY WEEK UNECONOMIC

Of course, we are not familiar with the inspiring purpose of Mr. Ford's action, but that it is uneconomic is as clear as day. What Mr. Ford might do, because of his peculiar position in the industrial world, cannot be a measure for all industry. Of course, Mr. Green tells us that the American Federation of Labor workers will produce just as much in the five-day week as in the six-day or five and a half day week. That is unadulterated bunk. There is not a union man who will exert himself one iota more per hour to produce more goods simply because he finishes on Friday night and not on Saturday. If it is true that there may be more production—sufficiently more to offset the lost time—it is a plain indictment of present methods of unionist work. In other words, it is an admission of slacking and it is an avowal that the unionist workers today are not giving their full effort for the wages they receive. The unions have always been opposed in every way, by speech, by legislative effort, by propaganda, to speeding up. Now they purpose to "speed up" so as to get a six-day wage for five days' work. Can Mr. Green agree to deliver the orders and have them carried out which will increase the production sufficiently to offset the time lost? He cannot and he knows it. It is unfortunate that Mr. Ford should feel called upon every now and then, because of his tremendous resources, to instigate so-called reform methods which merely make for economic disturbance. He should be quite content to do the best he can for his workers as other leaders in industry are doing. Undoubtedly he does not consider himself a part of the great industrial machine, or realize that all industry is interdependent. If he did this he would hesitate to put in effect, with a blare of trumpets, something which he knows is unworkable.

AMERICAN BUSINESS IS SOUND

Out in Los Angeles, the American Bankers Association have been holding their annual convention and dispatches assure us that they are unanimous in the underlaying soundness of American prosperity and predicting its continuance. This is heartening because the banker is in a position to note conditions throughout the country. Consensus of opinion appears to be that business will continue at a satisfactory rate throughout 1926 and that when the records for the twelve months are complete, it will out-rank even those of 1925, which are shown as most prosperious in the nation's history. The hope is held out that panic cycles are disappearing and in that respect we should like to quote the following from Oscar Wells, president of the Association:

"We doubtless now pursue a more equable course because of a better economic management in many respects. We have better currency and credit management through the Federal Reserve. We have better production and distribution management in our industries, which are able to keep closer watch on the demand side of their markets and control supplies accordingly. We have better transportation management, which means rapid, efficient distribution of goods. We have better inventory and merchandising management, made possible for both manufacturers and distributors of all kinds by efficient railroad conditions which enable them to virtually eliminate speculative purchasing from their operations and coordinate their stock closely with the volume of their sales."

JAPANESE ELECTRICAL WORKERS ASK FOR LONGER HOURS

An astonishing statement has just appeared in the newspapers to the effect that Japanese electrical workers are on strike for lower wages. The ordinary reader assumes a misprint and that the word "higher" should be substituted for the word "lower." But as a matter of fact the headline is correct. A Tokyo dispatch to the Associated Press reads as follows:

"For some time the Hiroshima Electrical Works has been experiencing bad business. The workers, realizing the situation, finally went to the management of the company and suggested that their wages be reduced. The employers, however, refused to make the cut, and the employs then insisted that they be permitted to do more work. This also was refused until the employes threatened to quit. The company hesitatingly acceded, and now every worker appears at the factory one hour earlier each day. In the meantime business is declared to be on the mend and the management states it soon will be in a position to raise wages."

It would seem as if the Japanese worker is possessed of both common sense and patriotism.

FAIR TREATMENT

The railroads of the country are not only free from the threat of government ownership, but they are fortunate in that there is considerable subsidence of antagonism which influenced political agitation to screw them down to the bare bone in operating outlay and rate of return. There is, too, recognition of the fact that the roads must have money if they are to build for the future so as adequately to care for the growing demands of commerce, and that investors will not advance the necessary funds unless they are assured of fair treatment.

FRESHENING BREEZES

As far as we are concerned they can call it a close incident, so long as Aimee don't insist that it was Charlie Ross and Pat Crowe who kidnapped her.

What has become of the old-fashioned kid who thot nothing of hiking a couple miles thru the snow to school?

Among the long-sad-roll-of-the missing is the old-fashioned sinner who ust to be afraid of the end of the world.

Also noted among the missing this fall is the old-fashioned prayer meeting for rain.

The five-day stopt law for marriages in this state seems to be working out allright, except for those who don't believe in long engagements.

The greatest drawback young married couples seem to find in this day and age is a garage in which to park the family automobile.

Money and time are the heaviest burdens of life, and the unhappiest of all mortals are those who have more of either than they know how to use.

And Now In Closing—

Too many merchants pass too much money over to fly-by-night advertising solicitors! The smooth one presents a publicity scheme that isn't worth a minute of the merchant's time or a dollar of his money, and can't possibly bring any returns.

The real estate and insurance office of Kinsey & Bay, which has been located in the county bank building, were last Saturday moved into the building formerly occupied by the Polly Kay Shop.

Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Hutchinson left Sunday morning for their winter home in Haines City, Florida, after spending the last few weeks here to personally look after the completion of their stone bungalow at Boulder Park.

A number of Indy friends of Mrs. Percy Durance and Mrs. John Rathburn gave them a "towel shower" at the Ives home last Monday evening. The ladies present were the Mesdames Doris Durnnce, Francis Olmstead, Viola Rathburn and the Misses Emma Wakefield, Marva Cooper and Vida Black.

The local unit of the County League of Women Voters met last Monday afternoon and elected officers as follows: Chairmnn, Mrs. Jas. Simmons; vice chnirman, Mrs. B. Saltonstall; sec.-treas., Mrs. H. B. Jncobs. Several women from Boyne City attended the meeting and participated in the study nnd discussion of the Michigan state constitution and the proposed amendments nnd revision.

People wondering why the whistles were blowing Tuesday forenoon may be interested to learn that it wns on nccount of the opening of the fish season on lake trout. The local fishermen had been patiently waiting for this happening and took this method to notify crews on their boats and celebrate the occasion. It was quite a sight to watch the small boats race for the big lake after receiving the news. The season opened considerably earlier this year than last and should give fishermen an excellent chance to clean up this fall.

The ladies of the M. E. Literary and Sewing Club will serve a supper at the M. E. church, Friday evening, October 29th, from 5:30 until all are served. Price 25 and 50 cents.—Adv. 42-t2.

ADVICE TO WOMEN VOTERS

The local unit of the county league of women voters, after making a careful study of the Michigan state constitution and the many opinions in regard to its revision, advises the women of Charlevoix to vote NO on the question of calling a constitutional convention in 1927.

The cost of such a convention would be enormous and in the end the new constitution might be rejected by the people.

Our state constitution is generally conceded to be a very excellent document. It is not excessively long. It is well drafted and comparatively easy to amend.

Any changes desired can be brought about by amendment with more safety, and at much less expense. People in general have more opportunity to study single amendments than a whole constitution.

The League also advises a careful study of the four amendments to be voted on next Tuesday. It is better not to vote on them at all than to vote without a knowledge of their meaning.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH
B. G. Mattson, D. D., Minister

The pastor will preach at the morning services, 10:30 on "The Cost of Sincerity." Sunday school follows the morning services. The young people's meeting at six thirty and evening service at seven thirty at which the pastor will resume the story of Christianity's Struggle with Heathenism. The subject of the address will be "The Christians Facing the Roman Tribunal."

Mid-week services are held every Thursday evening, 7:30.

FIRST NUMBER ON LECTURE COURSE

At Palace Theatre, November 12, at 8:00 O'clock

Certain critics, who have the most famous monologists, have ventured the strong assertion that Miss Lenhart excels her contemporaries in the matter of differentiating her characters. She has the dignity necessary for the heroiest parts and at the same time is surprisingly competent in simulating lighter characters. It is possible for her to draw such a marked distinction between seven or eight members of a cast that an audience can easily follow the entire play without a like of explanation.

Since her fourteenth year Miss Lenhart has been doing dramatic work—not commonplace dramatics, but dramatics of a type stamping her as unique in her profession. She devoted several seasons to directing and taking leads in plays in her home city of Pittsburgh. At the same time she was equipping herself through private study and training at King School of Dramatic Art. Her first work for the Redpath Bureau was done in 1920 when she appeared on courses which have booked such notables as Katharine Ridgeway, Gay MacLaren and Strickland Gillilan.

Selma Lenhart

LEGAL NOTICES

MORTGAGE SALE

Default having been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage made by Andrew Bert Williams and Josephine Williams, his wife, both of Doyle township, Schoolcraft county, Michigan, to James C. Wood, of the City of Manistique, Schoolcraft county, Michigan, dated October 5th, 1922, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for the county of Charlevoix, state of Michigan, on the 9th day of October, A. D. 1922, in Liber 23 of mortgages on page 486, whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative, on which said mortgage there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice for principal and interest and taxes paid by the mortgagee to protect his security, the sum of Three Hundred Three Dollars and twenty-eight cents ($303.28) and an attorney fee of twenty-five dollars as provided for in said mortgage and no suit or proceedings at law having been instituted to recover the moneys secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and the statute in such case made and provided, the undersigned will, on Saturday the 4th day of December, A. D. 1926, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the front door of the Court House in the city of Charlevoix in the county of Charlevoix, state of Michigan, that being the place where the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix is held, sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, the premises described in said mortgage, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount so due as aforesaid on said mortgage with seven per cent interest and all legal costs, together with said attorney fee, the premises being described in said mortgage as follows, to-wit:

The southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section thirty-five (35) and the south one-half of the southwest quarter of section thirty-six (36), all in town forty (40) north, of range ten (10) west, Charlevoix county, Michigan.

RAINS INJURE THE BEAN CROP

YIELD ESTIMATED AT 10 BUSHELS PER ACRE

Michigan Potato Crop Gives Promise of Being the Best in Quality for Years

Frequent rains during September greatly hindered the harvesting of the bean crop. On low, heavy lands many fields were drowned out and rendered almost worthless. The cool and wet weather also delayed ripening in late planted fields and a killing frost on September 26th found many green and immatured pods. As a result, many fields in the Saginaw valley and counties eastward will be too poor to harvest, and the remainder will have a heavy pick, according to a special report issued by L. Whitney Watkins, commissioner of agriculture and Verne H. Church, U. S. agricultural statistician for Michigan. Some early beans are being marketed and have a rather low pick but excess moisture content. The preliminary estimate, based on a yield of ten bushels per acre for the entire planted acreage, is 6,140,000 bushels. It is too early to determine the pickage, but it is certain to be heavy and some lots will not be worth picking. When these losses are deducted, it is probable that the merchantable crop will be reduced to five and one-half million bushels and it may fall to five millions.

The total crop of all-growing states is estimated at 16,970,000 bushels as compared with 19,100,000 in 1925. Reports from leading states are as follows: New York, 1,668,000 bushels; Montana, 391,000; Idaho, 1,320,000; Colorado, 1,197,000; New Mexico, 783,000; and California, 4,941,000.

The Potato Outlook

The Michigan potato crop promises to be of the finest quality in many years. A large percentage are of medium size and there is practically no blight. Yields are better than last year in some of the northern counties but average less in the central part of the Lower Peninsula. The estimated production is 27,888,000 bushels as compared with 24,411,000 in 1925, according to a special report. The killing frost of September 26 stopped further growth in all except the southwestern counties, which escaped the frost. In most sections, the killing of the vines was considered beneficial but the very late planted fields would have improved with two weeks additional growth. Digging is will under way and is progressing as fast as possible, being hindered to some extent by rainy weather.

The total crop of the United States is placed at 350,824,000, which is a decline of about three-fourths of a million bushels during September. Maine, New York, Wisconsin, Idaho and California made gains, but most of the other leading states show losses for the past month. Some rot in blight is reported from portions of New York. The present estimate indicates a shortage of about 30 million bushels in comparison with normal requirements. The shortage last year was around 60 millions, or about double that for the current crop. Therefore the statistical outlook is for fair prices but no spectacular advances, such as occured last year, if weather permits the satisfactory completion of the harvest in all states. Michigan ranks third in production this year.

BIG COMPANY HELPS LOCAL MERCHANTS KEEP BUSINESS AT HOME

How one of the largest manufacturing concerns in the country cooperates with their dealers to keep local business in the hands of the local concerns, was interestingly brought out in a talk with one of our leading tire merchants last week.

The company to which he pointed particularly for its work in this direction is The United States Rubber Company, which has perhaps gone further along these lines than any other tire concern.

There are several reasons, aside from the very good point of keeping home money at home, why our own local tire stores are the logical place to buy tires rather than the mail order houses.

Tires need looking after by an experienced tire man. He must have a well equipped and well stocked shop and be able to tell whether a tire is doing its work properly, and if not, why not.

For instance, an expert tire man can tell whether tires are wearing unduly because of the wheels being out of alignment and can correct the trouble in time.

If improperly epualized brakes are causing tire wear, the tire man can tell that and warn the owner.

This sort of service you cannot expect when you buy tires from mail order houses.

The United States Tire Company started eleven years ago to educate people to their interest in supporting the legitimate home town tire dealer.

In addition to running its own educational campaign in local papers without interruption for eleven consecutive years, the company encourages the dealer to supplement it with advertising of his own and help him do it. Under certain conditions it even shares the expense of the dealer's own advertising.

Recent improvements in production methods now enable the United States Rubber Company to market, through the local dealers, tires of known quality, bearing the company's full warranty, for as little money or even less than the cost of nameless mail order tires of uncertain value.

The ladies of the M. E. Literary and Sewing Club will serve a supper in the M. E. church, Friday evening, October 29th, from 5:30 until all are served. Price 25 and 50 cent.—Adv. 43-42

"STATE SHOULD LEAD TO ASSIST FARMERS"

Republican Nominee For Governor Makes Strong Plea

"We are living today in an era in which the industries are enjoying unprecedented prosperity," said Fred W. Green, Republican nominee for governor, in his Kalamazoo speach. Continuing, Mr. Green said, "Yet, agriculture is suffering as never before. The nation cannot remain prosperous if we allow this condition in agriculture to continue. The best minds of the nation are at work on this problem. In the past we have solved every economic problem. I am sure we shall solve this one.

"Michigan, so dependent on agriculture, should lead in the work of assuring the farmer a profit. It is not enough to say that a lowering of taxes will help the farmer. When Representatives of Agriculture have a plan looking to the raising of the prices of farm products to the farmer, I will gladly give them aid, whether I am governor or not.

"Our platform was not drawn merely as an aid to getting into office. I stand by every plank in it and if you send me to Lansing I will make every effort consistent with the duties of my office to enact this platform into law."

DEMS WOULD ELIMINATE TAX

Farmers Interested in Comstock's Pledge to Abolish State Property Levy.

The proposal in the platform adopted at the Muskegon convention of Michigan Democrats to do away with all state property taxes is proving of more than passing interest to the farmers of the state.

This proposal, which is along the lines of the so-called Virginia Plan, is now a law and in successful operation in Virginia, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and other states. The adoption of the plan would mean that the property owner would be all through paying his taxes after he settles his county and city or township assessments.

The party, under the leadership of William A. Comstock, its candidate for governor, proposes to make up the deficit in revenue due from such tax elimination through the specific taxes of the state, such as the corporation tax and gasoline tax.

Economy Pledged

Mr. Comstock pledges to cut state government costs one-third by obolishing unnecessary boards and employees. Chief among these economies is the elimination of the state police, which he characterizes as a "nuisance". Mr. Comstock also points out that the party platform is the only one adopted in the state which recognizes other needs of the farmer and proposes relief.

Included in the platform is the declaration favoring the assessment of farm lands on the basis of reasonable cash values, and not on the present basis of inflated war prices; it holds that the gas and motor vehicle tax should be sufficient to build and maintain all state trunk lines, county and township roads and thus to do away with the local property tax for road building and maintenance; it pledges close attention to the welfare of the farmers' children in school advantages and better tax equalization for school purposes and makes the promise that the state department of agriculture will find a way to a better marketing system for farm products as a necessity to the farmer's prosperity.

Petoskey and Traverse City Lead in Race for Northern Michigan Championship

Charlevoix high school football team failed. to stop the victorious rushes of the undefeated Petoskey team last Saturday and went down before their ripping attack 51 to 0.

The heavy red nnd white line was slow and showed no pep, Petoskey ball toters running the ends at will and plunged off tackle and through the line. It may be seen how poor a showing the locals made by the fact that they gained only 5½ yards from scrimmage to Petoskey's 464. Petoskey made 28 first downs. The only thing Charlevoix done well was punt, and Higman's toe probably saved the score from going over the one hundred mark. Gill played a good game at center.

Thia makes six straight victories for the Petoskey team, who are well on their way to a northern Michigan championship.

Cadillace won from Manistee last Saturday, but have no chance in the northern race on account of two defeats.

Traverse City remained a contender by her 14 to 0 defeat over Boyne City. Traverse City plays at Petoskey on Saturday, November 20, and these two teams will fight it out for the northern Michigan championship. Petoskey beat Boyne City 19 to 7 on Boyne's field, showing little difference in strength between the two tenms.

The strong Soo team suffered another set-back by their 17 to 0 defeat at Escnnaba, which puts them out of the northern rnce.

East Jordan high school football team upset the dope completely by trimming Harbor Springs in East Jordan's big home game of the season 6 to 0, Saturday. Tho victors scored in the third quarter on gains around ends, Gleason being the big star, aided by Taylor and Weaver. Shaw gained most ground for Harbor Springs. East Jordan claims the Class C title for the region as a result of the victory, having defeated Charlevoix and Harbor Springs. However, dopesters figure they must defeat Mancelona, Saturday, to have clear claim to the flag.

Following is the standing of teams in the northern Michigan championship race:

Team	Won	Lost	Tied
Petoskey	6	0	0
*Traverse City	4	2	0
Cadillac	3	2	1

LADY ASTOR SAYS WHAT SHE THINKS WHEN SHE THINKS IT

Lady Astor, in her recent visit to this country, made only one public address and in it took occasion to aay: "I could not answer the question 'What do you think of prohibition?' intelligently unless I travelled from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Canada to Mexico. But I can say this: That it impresses and depresaes mo that the people who are aaying thnt prohibition ls a failure are the ones that failed to try it; nnd the peopla who deplore the lawlessness of rum-runners are tho ones who aro breaking the laws themselves. Rum-runners would starve lf citizena obeyed the law. I ean't tell you about prohibition, but I can tell you what I think of drink. It has caused more misery than any one thing in the world. It has caused political, moral and social corruption, and never has belped man in his struggle from the material to the apiritual."

COOLIDGE ASKS PRAYER OF THANKS

ISSUES HIS THANKSGIVING DAY PROCLAMATION SATURDAY

Urges Poor Be Remembered When More Fortunate Gather For Day's Feast

President Coolidge Saturday issued a proclamation designating Thursday, November 25, as Thanksgiving day.

The text of the president's proclamation follows:

"As a nation and as individuals we have passed another twelve months in favor of the almighty. He has smiled upon our fields and they have brought forth plentifully; business has prospered; industries have flourished, and labor has been well employed. While sections of our country have been visited by disaster, we have been spared any great nationally calamity or pestilential visitations. We are blessed among the nations of the earth.

"Our moral spiritual life has kept measure with our material prosperity. We are not unmindful of the gratitude we owe to God or his watchful care which pointed out to use the ways of peace and happiness; we should not fail in our acknowledgement of his divine favor which bestowed upon us so many blessings. Neither should we be forgetful of those among us who, through stress of circumstances, are less fortunately placed, but by deeds of charity make our acknowledgement more acceptable in His sight.

"Wherefore, I Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, do hereby set apart Thursday, the twenty-fifth day of November, next, as a day of general thanksgiving and prayer and I recommend that on that day the people shall cease from their daily work, and in their homes or in their accustomed places of worship, devoutly give thanks to the Almighty for the many and great blessings they have received, and seek his guidance that through good deeds and brotherly love they may deserve a continuance of his favor."

"ERSTWHILE SUSAN" BY MISS LENHART

Selma Lenhart, noted dramatic reader, who reproduces a complete play in an evening, will appear here on the Lyceum, Friday evening, November 12. Miss Lenhart an experieneed entertainer with exceptional ability.

In presenting an entire east of widely different charactera Miss Lenhart has the dignity necessary for the heaviest parts and at the same time, is surprisingly competent in simulating lighter characters.

Many erities who have heard the platform'a most famous monologists venture the strong assertion that she excels her contemporarica in the matter of differentlnting her characters.

Miss Lenhart's presentation of "Erstwhile Susan" has been one of her most popular successes. It ls tho play which she usually gives in eommunities where she haa not before appeared. However, her repertoire includes other plays of equal popularity and a series of delightful miscellaneous aketches, which will ba given if requested.

GREEN CARRIES STATE BY OVER 2 TO 1 VOTE

VOTE ONE OF LIGHTEST CAST IN MANY YEARS

Only 303 Voters Exercise Their Frenchiso in the Three Wards of City

Tuesday's general election of state and county ofices resulted in about the smallest vote ever cast in a similar election, as was proved when the votes were counted both in the county and the state in generul.

Only 303 votes were cast in the three wards of the City of Charlevoix, nnd practically every township cast about a 25 per cent vote. From returns received from the state in general, the same attitude prevailed in almost every section, unless where contests were taking place.

Late incomplete returns indicate that Fred W. Green will carry the state by better than a two to one vote over his democratic opponent, William A. Comstock. Precincts from which the vote has heen returned are as follows: 2209 out of 2983 give Green 293,436; Comstock, 164,956.

In the county the Republican candidates received their usual vote, their being no contest. Little interest was shown other than casting their vote for the head of the ticket, the ballots cast showing considerably less than half the number cast at the primary election.

Two out of five of the amendments voted upon were lost. No. 1 relative to ralse of pay for our legislatora, and No. 5, relative to a revision of the constitution. The others carried by small majorities.

The vote as cast in Charlevoix county follows:

BEAUTIFUL HOME NOW UNDER CONSTRUCTION

Unusual Design of Structure Causing Considerable Comment

Whnt will be one of the most beautiful residences in the clty is now under eonstruction for Mrs. J. J. Knight of Kalamazoo, Michigan, on her Belvedere avenue property, from plans drnwn by Ernest S. Batterson, Kalamazoo architect.

The house ls of Spanish and English construction of unusunl design. The finish is of high-lighted French stucco, with trim and paneling of red brick. The roof covering is green stained shingles.

The house will contain 7 sleeping rooms, 2 sun rooms, living room, dining room, kitchen and breakfast nook, and will have a modern heating plant so that it may be used summer and winter.

D. T. McHugh, local contractor, has charge of the building operations, and when completed, it is estimated the cost will be around $20,000.00.

SCHOOL BAND IS ORGANIZED

JOHN TERWEE ENGAGED TO LEAD HIGH SCHOOL BOYS

Fine New Instruments Purchased and 25 Members Enthusiastic Over Work.

Charlevoix high school has joined other high schools in northern Michigan who now boast a successful student band, and have engaged John TerWee of East Jordan as leader of their newly formed organization.

Mr. TerWee, who is now leader of three high school bands, has beea in the game for around 30 years. He graduated from the school of music in Leyden, Holland, in 1904, and started leading bands in 1905. This will make the seventh band he has organized from beginners and judging from the work he has done as hand instructor he has been exceptionally successful.

The Charlevoix high school band will start with twenty-five pieces with the following membership: Cornets, Junior Supernaw, Glenn Heise, LaVern Rice, Devere Bird, Oscar Stroud, David Livingston, Dan Geneit. Clarinets, Clare Smith, Marvin Dixon, Charles Novotney, Robert McCall, Edwin Madill, Robert Atchison, Wallace Saunders, Charles Krulik, Ole Neilson, Hershal Brown, Joseph Smith. Altos, Carlton Ikens, Wilson Howe, Wm. Shapton, Marcus Cross. Bass horn, Lee Shapton, Ilo Helms. Baritone, Carl Snyder. Saxophone, Wayne Belding, Franklin Ross, Charles Bleha, William Novak. Drums, Keith Williams, snare, John Williams. Trombones, Pat Moran, Bruce Reinhart, Ted Browe, Joseph Arvilla, Charles Sterritt.

Other boys who would like to join the band should apply to Mr. Coverdale at once. The instruments have been received and are now on display in Fessenden's store window. The boys will pay for their instruments and own them themselves. It may be arranged so that practice sessions will come during school hours, but it is more likely that they will be held after school hours. The boys have an excellent leader in Mr. TerWee, and have entered the work with enthusiasm that predicta a successful future.

BUILDING NEW STORAGE SHED

Will Give Considerable Storage Space Under Cover

Hamilton & Son have nearly completed a large new storuge shed at their boat yard, dimensions of which will be 27 by 80 feet. The structure ls laid on a concrete foundation and is built on the south end of their present work shop.

The purpose of the new building is to store boats and keep them out of the weather so that repair work and painting may be carried on during the ralny spring season without interruption. The east side will be covered by huge heavy canvns curtains which may be drawn up in rolls. By this arrangement large sail boats may be stored under cover during the winter. The new structure will greatly improve working and storage faeilities at the boat yard.

IMPORTANT PROBLEM IS UP AGAIN

MORE SUITABLE GYMNASIUM SHOULD BE PROVIDED

Upon Request We Have Endeavored to Show Our Stand in the Matter

After making a thorough canvass of the city for the most suitable place for Charlevoix high school to play their basketball games, and even considering building a temporary gymnasium, the board of education Monday evening instructed Supt. Coverdale to make arrangements for the Hooker garage again this winter.

It seems to the writer that after the experiences of the past two or three years in Hooker's garage, and those of years previous when the old roller rink wns used as a gymnasium, would have shown the board of education that Charlevoix high school cannot possibly keep up enthusiasm among students in basketball or other indoor athletics when they have to practice and play under such conditions.

The athletic association found great difficulty last year in arranging a basketball schedule becauso outside teams refused to play in a barn. They were justified in their actions. The result was that two or three home games were all that could be scheduled. And this is not half of the story. You ask your friends, "Well, are you going to the basketball game tonight?" And they answer promptly, "I should say not. The last time I went down there I carried the odor of a livery barn around with me for three days and nearly froze in the bargain." The result is that parents and local fans will not attend the games. This lack of local support would dishearten any team and at the same time puts the athletic association in the holo for lack of gate receipts.

One of the main objections is the matter of heat. No one likes to go to a ball game and have to huddle around a stove to keep warm or otherwise endanger their health hy taking to the benches. Even though this matter was remedied the place would be far from suitable for a gymnasium and we could go on with a dozen other reasons to prove this argument.

It is our hope, and also the hope of many parents who have children in school who are interested in athletics, that the board might see their way to arrange for a suitable gymnasium until the new high school is built.

HAVE MANY IMPROVEMENTS UNDER WAY

Chicago Club to Carry Out Extensive Program Before Next Season

The Chicago Club of Charlevoix is again occupying a front position in regard to improvements on their buildings and grounds. Around $75,000.00 was spent by this organization last year on their golf links and numerous other improvements, and it is expected nearly the sama amount will be expended before tha 1927 resort season begins.

Don McHugh has the contracts for the aeveral jobs, which include new concrete approaches to all driveways entering the grounds, a large addition to the present dining room, and replacing the fences around tha grounds. Another large job is tha 20-foot additlon to the Chicago Club boat house, made necessary by receding waters in Round lake. Dredging and piling work has been completed and construction on the addition will be started aoon. The club's Lake Charlevoix bathing pier has also been rebuilt and lengthened.

Impovements of this nature, whila adding to the value of the property, also furnish work for home citizens throughout the winter. Don McHugh, local contractor, including the jobs before mentioned, has fourteen large contracts either completed or now under way. Looks like a busy winter.

No more, no less . . . but Quaker Oats has the flavor

THE difference in breakfast oats is in their flavor. The price mostly is the same.

Millions demand the Quaker brand because of its toasty, wonderful flavor. For flavor is the important point in food.

Some 50 years were spent perfecting that famous Quaker flavor. Once you taste it, you are spoiled for ordinary oats.

Quaker milling, too, retains much of the "bulk" of oats. And that makes laxatives less often needed. Protein, carbohydrates and vitamines and "bulk" are thus combined to make Quaker Oats an excellently balanced ration.

Get Quick Quaker (cooks in 3 to 5 minutes) or Quaker Oats today at your grocer. See how much finer tomorrow's breakfast will be than today's.

Canning Factory Meeting at East Jordan.

Plans have been completed to hold a meeting in the county for assistance to the farmers who are raising crops for the new canning factory at East Jordan, or are interested in the proposition for another year. The officials of the factory have decided to add the necessary machinery to take in small fruits and vegetables for next year, which news is very welcome to many farmers.

Geo. E. Starr, professor of horticulture of M. S. C., will be the main speaker at the big meeting to be held in the high school auditorium of East Jordan on the night of November 5, at 7:30 standard time.

He has had considerable experience with small fruits and vegetables and the many factors involved in the success of a canning factory. He can give you valuable suggestions as to the right varieties to grow, cultural methods, preparation of the land and seed, harvesting methods and many other factors, which will be of mutual benefit and profit to you and to the canning factory.

By all means plan to attend this meeting at East Jordan on Friday night, November 5th, at 7:30 standard time.

Dairy Meeting Next Week.

This article is to announce that a series of Dairy Feeding Schools will be conducted in the county for the assistance to farmers with their many problems, connected with dairy production.

J. G. Wells, extension specialist, in dairying, will be present and is particularly fitted to discuss dairy problems, as at present he is in charge of the dairy work in the upper peninsula and has had considerable practical experience with the dairy industry all through the state.

The following meetings have been arranged for the county:

Tuesday, Nov. 9th, 12:30 fast time, p. m., farm of Martin Howard, Chandler township, Chandler Hill road.

Tuesday, Nov. 9th, 3:00 fast time p. m., farm of Robt. Russell, Hudson township, East Boyne Falls road.

Wednesday, Nov. 10th, 9:30 fast time a. m., farm of John Struthers, hill on M-11, one-half mile east of Greensky.

Wednesday, Nov. 10th, 1:30 fast time p. m., farm of Albert West, Bay township, east and north of Horton Bay.

Thursday, Nov. 11th, 9:30 fast time, a. m., farm of Geo. VerSnyder, south of Charlevoix on M-11.

Thursday, Nov. 11th, 1:30 fast time, p. m., farm of Lawrence Boss, Marion township, two miles west of Phelps.

Friday, Nov. 12th, 9:30 fast time, a. m., farm of Terry Barber, East Jordan road, 6 miles south of Boyne City.

Friday, Nov. 12th, 1:30 fast time, p. m., Charlevoix County Poor Farm, South Arm township, north of East Jordan.

Now is the time of year to make your plans for the winter. What to feed and how much to feed are two of the big questions. These and many other subjects will be discussed by Mr. Wells. Don't dress up—come just as you are. All meetings will probably be held in the dairy barn, where the atmosphere will be pure dairy.

The Note

Margery Marshall had entered high school this fall. She was growing tall, and her beauty already was remarkable. Her little head carried its great black braid proudly. The pallor of her skin was perfectly healthy—and even the senior lads were seen to observe her with interest and appreciation.

The results of Lydia's summer dressmaking had not been bad. She had made herself several creditable shirtwaists and a neat little blue serge skirt. She came back to school with zeal and less than her usual sense of shabbiness.

It was a day toward the first of October at the noon hour that Lydia met Kent and Charlie Jackson.

"Hello, Lyd! How's everything?" asked Kent. "I haven't seen you to talk to since last spring."

"Did you have a fine summer?" said Lydia.

"Aw, only part of it. Dad made me work till the middle of August, then Charlie and I camped up on the reservation."

"There comes Margery," said Lydia. "She hardly speaks to me now, she's been to New York."

"She is a peach," exclaimed Charlie, eyeing Margery in her natty blue suit appraisingly.

"How do do, Kent!" Margery approached languidly, including Lydia and Charlie in her nod. "I hope you all had a pleasant summer. Mother and I were in New York."

Kent, Lydia and Charlie exchanged glances.

"I had a pretty good summer," said Lydia. "I sewed and cooked and scrubbed and swam, and once Adam, dad, Mr. Levine and I walked clear round the lake, eighteen miles."

"I don't see how your father can let that Mr. Levine come to your house!" exclaimed Margery with sudden energy. "My father says he's a dangerous man."

"He's a crook!" said Charlie stolidly and finally.

Lydia stamped her foot. "He's not, and he's my friend!" she cried.

"Levine's a crook!" repeated Charlie, slowly. "If what he's trying to do goes through, my tribe'll be wanderers on the face of the earth. If I thought it would do any good, I'd kill him. But some other brute of a White would take his place. It's hopeless."

The three young whites looked at the Indian wonderingly. Their little spatting was as nothing, they realized, to the mature and tragic bitterness that Charlie expressed. A vague sense of a catastrophe, epic in character, that the Indian evidently saw clearly, but was beyond their comprehension, silenced them. The awkward pause was broken by the school bell.

Lydia had plenty to think of on her long walk home. Charlie's voice and words haunted her. What did it all mean? Why was he so resentful and so hopeless? She made up her mind that when she had the opportunity to ask him, she would.

The opportunity came about simply enough. At recess one day a week or so later he asked her if she was going to the first senior "hop" of the year. Lydia gave him a clear look.

"Why do you ask me that? Just to embarrass me?" she said.

Charlie looked startled. "Lord knows I didn't mean anything," he exclaimed. "What're you so touchy about?"

Lydia's cheeks burned redder than usual. "I went to a party at Miss Towne's when I was a freshman and I promised myself I'd never go to another."

"Why not?" Charlie's astonishment was genuine.

"Clothes," replied Lydia, briefly.

The Indian boy leaned against a desk and looked Lydia over through half-closed eyes. "You're an awful pretty girl, Lydia. Honest you are, and you've got more brain in a minute than any other girl in school'll have all her life."

Lydia blushed furiously. Then moved by Charlie's simplicity and obviously sincere liking, she came closer to him and said, "Then, Charlie, why hasn't any boy ever asked me to a party? Is it just clothes?"

"Lydia, I'll take you to a party a week, if you'll go!" he cried.

"No! No! I couldn't go," she protested. "Answer my question—is it clothes?"

"No, only half clothes," answered Charlie, meeting her honestly. "The other half is you know too much. You know, the fellows like a girl that giggles a lot and don't know as much as he does and that's a peachy dancer and that'll let him hold her hand and kiss her. And that's the honest to God truth, Lydia."

"Oh," she said. "Oh—" Then, "Well, I could giggle, all right. I can't dance very well because I've just picked up the steps from watching the girls teach each other in the cloakroom. Oh, well, I don't care! I've got Adam and I've got Mr. Levine. Why do you hate him so, Charlie?"

"Lots of reasons. And I'll hate him more if he gets his bill through congress."

"I don't see why you feel so," said Lydia.—"You get along all right without the reservation, why shouldn't the other Indians. I don't understand."

"No, you don't understand," replied Charlie, "you're like most of the other whites around here. You see a chance to get land and you'd crucify each other if you needed to, to get it. What chance do Indians stand? But I tell you this," his voice sank to a hoarse whisper and his eyes looked far beyond her, "if there is a God of the Indians as well as the whites, you'll pay some day! You'll pay as we are paying."

"Gee, Charlie, Perhaps It Could Be Fixed!"

Lydia shivered. "Don't talk so, Charlie. I wish I knew all about it, the truth about it. If I was a man, you bet before I voted I'd find out."

"Look here, Lydia," exclaimed Charlie, "why don't you come up on the reservation for a camping trip, next summer, for a week or so?"

"Costs too much," said Lydia.

"Wouldn't, either. I can get tents and it wouldn't cost you anything but your share of the food. Kent'll go and maybe one of the teachers would chaperon."

Lydia's eyes kindled. "Gee, Charlie, perhaps it could be fixed! I got nine months to earn the money in. It's something to look forward to."

Charlie nodded and moved away. "You'll learn things up there you never dreamed of," he said.

The conversation with John Levine did not take place until the Sunday before the election. The fight in the congressional district had increased in bitterness as it went on. Family feuds developed. Ancient family skeletons regarding the pine grafts and Indian looting saw the light of day.

On the Saturday a week before election Lydia went to pay her duty call on Margery. Elviry admitted her.

"Margery'll be right down," said Elviry. "She's just finished her nap."

"Her what?" inquired Lydia, politely.

"Her nap. A New York beauty doctor told me to have her take one every day. She went to the 'hop' last night. She looked lovely in a cream chiffon. One of the college professors asked who was that little beauty. Come in, Margery."

Margery strolled into the room in a bright red kimono. "How do do, Lydia," she said.

"Hello, Margery. Want to play paper dolls?"

"Paper dolls!" shrieked Elviry. "Why, Lydia, you are fifteen!"

"I don't care," replied Lydia obstinately. "I still play 'em once in a while."

"I haven't touched one since last spring," said Margery. "Want to see my New York clothes?"

"No, thank you," answered Lydia. "I'd just as soon not. I've got to get home right away."

"What's in that big bundle?" asked Elviry, pointing to the huge paper parcel in Lydia's lap.

"Nothing," she said shortly, looking at the rope portieres in the doorway.

"I got new ones in the East," said Elviry, following her gesture. "Shells strung together. But I put 'em up only when we have parties. Who made your shirtwaist, Lydia?"

"I did," answered Lydia, not without pride.

"I thought so," commented Elviry. "I don't suppose your father's had a raise, yet. He ain't that kind. Does he pay Levine any rent for that cottage?"

"Of course, every month!" exclaimed Lydia, indignantly.

"Oh! I just asked! Your father's been talking strong for him at the mill factory, they say, and we just wondered. He's old enough to be your father, but you're getting to be a young lady now, Lydia, and it's very bad for your reputation to be seen with him. You haven't any mother and I must speak."

"I don't see how John Levine's reputation about Indians or pine lands can hurt me any," protested Lydia, angrily, "and I just think you're the impolitest person I know."

The front door slammed as she spoke and Dave Marshall came in.

"Hello! Well, Lydia, this is a sight for sore eyes. Thought you'd forgotten us." He looked from his two women folks to Lydia. "What've you two been saying now?" he asked gruffly.

Elviry tossed her head. "Nothing at all. You said that Lydia and Amos ought to be warned about Levine."

"Yes, I did," exclaimed Dave, with a sudden change of voice. "You tell your father to come round and see me this evening, Lydia. I don't like his attitude on the reservation question. Tell him if I can't change his views any other way, I may have to bring pressure with that note."

Lydia buttoned her coat with trembling fingers.

"Yes, sir, I'll tell him," she said. "We'll pay that note up, somehow. Even if can't be allowed to keep us from believing what we believe." Her voice strengthened suddenly. "What's the use of being an American if you can't believe what you want to? I'm not going to tell my father to come to see you. I'll answer right now. We'll think and say what we please and you can do whatever you want to about that nasty old note."

Dave suddenly laughed. "There, Elviry, that's what I mean about Lydia's being the real thing. You can't help my being your friend, Lydia, no matter what happens. But," grimly, "I'll call in that note unless your father shuts up."

"Good-by!" exclaimed Lydia, abruptly and she marched into the hall, head held high, and closed the outside door firmly behind her.

It had been a long time since she had known the heavy sinking of the heart that she felt now. She had an utter horror of repeating Marshall's message to her father. Money worry made Amos frantic.

In the midst of one of her longest sighs Billy Norton overtook her.

"Well, Lydia."

"Hello, Billy," said Lydia, looking up at the young man soberly. Billy was a sophomore in college. "Billy, is there any way a girl like me could earn $600?" she asked him.

"Golly, not that I know of! Why?"

"Oh, I just asked. I wish I was a man."

Billy looked at the scarlet cheeks and the blowing yellow curls: "I don't," he said. "What's worrying you, Lyd?"

"Nothing," she insisted. Then, anxious to change the subject, she asked, "What're you studying to be, Billy?"

"A farmer. I believe a farmer's the most independent man in the world. And that's what I want to be, independent—call no man boss."

"That's me, too, Billy," cried Lydia, pausing at her gate. "That's what I want to be, independent. That's what real Americans are."

Lydia did not tell her father that night of Marshall's threat. He was in such a tranquil mood that she could not bear to upset him. But the next day she gathered her courage together and told him. To her surprise, instead of walking the floor and swearing, he gave a long whistle.

"So it's that serious, is it? I wonder just what he's up to! The old crook! Huh! This will be nuts for John, though. If he doesn't come out this afternoon I'll go look him up this evening."

Lydia's jaw dropped. "But, daddy, you don't seem to realize we'll have to pay $600 the first of January," she urged, her voice still trembling.

For the first time Amos looked at her carefully. "Why, my deaf child, there's nothing to worry about!" he exclaimed. "Now," his voice softened, "you stop worrying. Levine and I'll take care of this."

Lydia looked at her father doubtfully and suddenly he laughed unsteadily and kissed her. "You get more and more like your mother. I don't know what I'd do without you, Lydia, I swan."

Levine stole away from his various councils and reached the cottage about supper time.

"If I didn't get out here once in a while," he said as he sat down to the waffles and coffee that made the Sunday night treat Lydia had lately developed, "I'd get to believe everyone was playing politics."

Amos suddenly burst forth, "Lydia, tell John about Dave Marshall."

Lydia, flushing uncomfortably, did so. Levine did not cease his onslaught on the waffles during the recital.

"Good news, eh, Amos?" he said. "Getting anxious, isn't he!" Then, catching Lydia's look of consternation, "Why, bless your soul, Lydia, what are you upset about? Let him call in the loan. I can pay it."

Amos nodded. "Just what I said. I'll make my interest and payments to you then, thank the Lord!"

"We'll make them on time just as usual," remarked Lydia, in a voice that had both reproof and warning in it.

"So Marshall's worried," repeated John. "Well, it behooves him to be. I don't know what he'll do when the Indians are gone."

"Mr. Levine," asked Lydia, "where'll the Indians go?"

John shrugged his shoulders. "Go to the devil, most of them."

"Oh, but that seems terrible!" cried Lydia.

"No more terrible than the way they live and die on the reservation. My dear child, don't develop any sentiment for the Indian. He's as doomed as the buffalo. It's fate or life or evolution working out—whatever your fancy names it. No sickly gush will stop it. As long as the Indian has a pine or pelt, we'll exploit him. When he has none, we'll kick him out, like the dead dog he is."

Lydia, her eyes round, her lips parted, did not reply. For a moment she saw the Levine that the world saw, cold, logical, merciless. John interpreted her expression instantly and smiled. "Don't look at me so, young Lydia. I'm just being honest. The rest talk about 'freeing the Indian.' I say d—n the Indian, enrich the whites."

"I suppose you're right, but I can't help feeling sorry for Charlie Jackson and my old squaw."

Levine nodded understandingly and turned to Amos. "What's the talk in the factory?" he asked.

During the half hour that followed Lydia did not speak again nor did she hear any of the conversation. When

ANNOUCEMENT

We have recently secured the agency for the A. H. Grebe and Company line of Radio Receivers. This receiver has features that no other receiver on the market has incorporated in its construction. In performance it is second to none. And there are definite and easily understood reasons why this is so. Back of these is Grebe construction—the standard of the industry. Every part of the Grebe set is designed and made in the Grebe factory.

GREBE BINOCULAR COILS

Guarantee "Selective Sensitivity" or the power to get a desired station, and keep undesired stations from breaking through."

GREBE LOW-WAVE EXTENSION CIRCUITS

Enable the Synchrophase to receive stations down to 150 meters. This means that it will tune-in over 100 existing low-wave stations with worthwhile programs, not now availalbe to other receivers.

GREBE COLORTONE

With it you may vary to your taste the quality of speech or music, from high thin pitch to low, deep round tones, with all variations between, without changing the positions of the dials or losing the full strength of the broadcast signals. It is also possible to suppress, to a great extent, disturbances due to static.

GREBE VOLUME CONTROL

In the SYNCHROPHASE a complete and continuous range of sound intensity from all stations, is at your disposal, without any distortion or change in the character of the sound.

GREBE FLEXIBLE-UNIT CONTROL

Enable you to set two or all three dials by operating one; or to adjust all three separately, at will.

The GREBE SYNCHROPHASE will give you everything that Radio has to offer. Hear it.

EDUCATIONAL WEEK

The state has just emerged from a strenuous political campaign, during which much was heard about those who neglect their duties of citizenship by remaining away from the polls. The right of franchise in a democracy should be exercised by every individual, but many deny themselves of that privilege and thereby permit rule by minorities and goverment by blocs.

Not only in protection of our liberties is it important that we make use of the ballot, but there are many other duties that fit into a republican form of government in the making of a patriotic citizen. During the week of November 7-13; which will be known as "Educational Week," the duties of citizenship will be clearly outlined in a constructive program lasting over n period of seven days. The work and needs of the schools will be stressed, nnd it should not be necessary to urge the general public to take part in this program, which will be held in the schools and churches throughout the state and nntion.

The program outlined will be substantially as follows: Sunday, November 7—"For God and Country Day"; Monday, November 8—"Constitutional Rights Day"; Tuesday, November 9—"Patriotism Day"; Wednesday, November 10—"Equal Opportunity Day"; Thursday, November 11—"Armistice Day"; Friday, November 12—"Know Your School Day"; Saturday, November 13—"Community Day."

MORE BUSINESS PREDICTED

Car surpluses have been wiped out by the swelling traffic of the railroads and every one connected with transportation is being urged to do everything possible to conserve equipment in order to avert a car shortage. Commodity committee reports generally predict a busier season for the next three months than for the last three months of 1925. Inventories and stocks of raw materials are about the same as last year, and in some instances slightly less. Reports of commodity committees show that business conditions in the agricultural and general machinery industry are exceptionally good at this time, a few manufacturers of agricultural equipment reporting an estimated increase in volume of shipments of 50 per cent over the last quarter of 1925. The excavating and material handling machinery business is in a healthy condition owing to belated letting of public work due to the late spring.

PEDDLER TYPES

When this newspaper warns against the peddler, we do not wish to be construed as including our own townspeople, taxpayers of the community, who may wish to carry on a business that necessitates a house-to-house visit. Neither should we include the farmer who wishes to dispose of his products in the residential districts. These people have a legitimate right in the general plan of merchandising, and there should be no attempt to legislate against them.

But there is a class of peddlers that we should avoid. They are the well-fed, sleek individuals that swoop down upon us from the large industrial centers, with the sole purpose of preying upon the public by peddling inferior goods at high prices. There is a distinction in the peddler class, so-called, that should be carefully analyzed and no hesitancy shown in turning down those unworthy of your patronage.

ARMISTICE DAY

On Thursday, November 11th, this nation will observe the eighth Armistice Day since the signing of that historic document on the blood-soaked fields of Flanders. Men and nations forget. Wounds that were deep, wounds festered nnd rubbed with the salt of hate, have healed in the sunshine of a new day, scars that were thought ineffacable are vnnishing as the years pass on. Once more men and goods travel the seas where sniled the grim destroyers, nnd the plow turns ever deeper the buried hatreds of the greatest war. And it is well that we forget.

But let us not forget those who, when the nation called in those stormy days, were the first to answer. So let us join on Armitice Day this year in paying silent tribute, due, reverent homage to Our Glorious Dead.

RAILROAD WAGE STATISTICS

The Interstate Commerce Commision has issued its monthly compilation of railrond wage statistics. The report states that class 1 railroads of the United States had 1,857,219 employes as of the middle of July, and that their total compensation for the month was $254,617,054. The number of employes shows an increase of 23,598 or 1.3 per cent over the month of June, and the compensation an increase of 2.2 per cent, due according to the statement to an increase in the number of hours worked per employe and a larger proportion of overtime.

A newspaper editor is very often urged to jump on every manner of evil, alleged and so called. Those who see the evil, however, are very reluctant to sign their names to statements.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEMPERANCE RALLY

Held in Congregational Church Sunday Afternoon

An interesting union Sunday School Temperance Rally was held at the Congregational church last Sunday afternoon, under the auspices of the Womnn's Christian Temperance Union.

A recitation by Pearl Smith entitled "Daniel's Band," a demonstration of the Nationnl Prohibition Guard Work by the Winner's class, and an address on "Safeguarding the Nation" by Rev. Pollock, were the special program features.

"Grass" Is Screen's Perfect Production

"Grass," Paramount's production which opens at the Palace next November 4, was called 90 per cent perfect by the critic of "Movie Weekly," one of the fan publications. The review is printed below:

"'Grass' is the perfect production! And lest anyone mistake our meaning, we hasten to say that the 'Grass' we refer to is the 'much-heralded screen drama which was filmed in Persia by Merian C. Cooper, Marguerite Harrison and Ernest B. Schoedsack."

"Born to West" Novel Western

A motion picture that moves with the celerity of a machine gun.

That—is Zane Grey's story of a great family feud,—and how it affected a girl. John Waters has brought it to the screen as a Paramount production. "Born to the West" is the tale of two boys, who as school lads, fought over a girl. On reaching manhood, their paths cross again. Then—but you'd better see the film when it arrives at the Palace Theatre on November 6 and 7.

"Behind the Front" Roots for Woman War Worker

The war worker is coming into her own in the realm of screen fiction.

The Red Cross nurse's admirable and arduous duty at the bedside of the wounded soldiers in the hospitals of France and America has had its full quota of praise, and the Salvation Army lassies have been lauded to the skies and been made the subject of romances.

The picture is based on Hugh Wiley's "Saturday Evening Post" story, "The Spoils of War." It was directed by Edward Sutherland, and the screen play written by Ethel Doherty. And it's coming to the Palace on November 10.

We are all ready with a fine line of canned goods for National Canned Food Week, Nov. 9 to 20. Visit our store and inspect our line. Martin Block.—Adv. 44t1

CHURCH OF GOD

P. A. June, Minister

Services will be held in the chapel on West Hurlburt, next Sunday, as follows:

Morning service; Preaching at 10:30 a. m.

Sunday school at 11:45 a. m.

Young People's Class Meeting at 6:30 p. m.

Evening service: Reguler worship at 7:30 p. m.

Prayer meeting at 7:30 Wednesday evening.

Sewing Circle meets Thursday p.m. at 1:30 with Mrs. Bernice Pearl, on West Hurlburt avenue.

Next week, on November 11, 12 and 13, there will be held at the Church of God chapel, an assembly meeting. All day services. Program will be arranged in the meantime. There will be a number of speakers. We invite everyone to attend.

Immediately following this three day meeting will come the revival, starting November 14. We will have with us as evangelists the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Millspaugh from Sullivan, Illinois, the "singing evangelists." They have traveled extensively over the states and in Canada, holding revival meetings and tent meetings. Fourteen years of evangelistical and pastorial work have been their duties. They are able and fluent speakers. If you have any affliction or are sick, come. The Lord will heal you. Lectures from biblical charts. Don't fail to come.

Young Fruit Trees Are in Danger From Rodents

As soon as cold weather has destroyed the green vegetation upon which mice and rabbits feed, they will be looking elsewhere for succulent food. Young fruit trees are in danger after these pests have once tasted the juicy bark. One rabbit can girdle a dozen trees in a day unless precautions are taken to prevent it. Rabbits attack trees that are from one to six years old; mice injure trees of any age. It is better and cheaper to protect the tree trunks this fall than to try to save girdled trees next spring by bridge grafting.

Trees may be protected either by painting the trunks with concentrated lime sulphur solution or by placing some protector about the trunk. Protectors may be made from poultry wire, building paper, or cornstalks. Patented protectors made of wood veneer or wire may be secured on the market. Eighteen-inch poultry wire with half-inch mesh is very satisfactory and has the advantage of serving for several years without being removed. Building paper, veneer and cornstalks serve equally well, but these should be removed in the spring since they afford shelter for wooly aphis, mealy bug and other injurious insects.

Mice will do very little damage where the above precautions are taken, but it is well to remove grass, weeds and rubbish from around the trees so they will not be encouraged to build nests close to the trunks.

GREAT YEARS IN THE NATION'S HISTORY

Interesting things have happened in 1926. Commander Byrd in a Fokker airplane, circled the North Pole. Photographs taken in Europe were transmitted on radio waves to America, and published in newspapers a few hours later. Gertrude Ederle, daughter of a New York butcher, swam the English Channel one hour faster than any of the five men who had swum it before her.

Is anything interesting going to happen in 1927?

For one thing, the Youth's Companion on April 16, will celebrate its HUNDREDTH BIRTHDAY. During 1927, the Companion will contain more interesting reading than ever before during its century of successful life. Consider what you will get for $2.00: 52 issues, containing 9 book length serials, 260 short stories by the most popular authors, more than 100 special articles, a weekly section for ingenious boys, called the "Y. C. Lab," a thorough girl's department, and 52 pages for children. Also in each issue, an extensive survey of current events, making it easy for you to follow the affairs of this busy world.

Don't miss the greatest year of a great magazine. Subscribe now, and receive:

1. The Youth's Companion—52 issues in 1927, and
2. The remaining issues of 1926. All for only $2.
3. Or include McCall's Magazine, the monthly authority on fashions. Both publications, only $2.50.

LYDIA of the Pines

by Honoré Willsie

(© by Frederick A. Stokes Co.) WNU Service

Levine rose at once to leave she followed him to the door. "Adam and I'll walk a way with you," she said "while dad puts his chickens to bed."

"Fine!" exclaimed John.

Lydia trudged along for a few moments in silence. Then Levine pulled her hand through his arm.

"Out with it, young Lydia," he said.

"Do you suppose," she asked, "that God is something like ether—or like electricity in the air, everywhere something that sort of holds us together, you know?"

"Well," redhed John, slowly, "I wouldn't want to believe that. I want to find a God we can know and understand a God that's tender and—and human, by Jove."

Lydia looked up at him quickly in the starlight. "After what you said about Indians tonight, you can't believe God could be tender and—and let that happen?"

Levine returned her look and smiled. "You score there, honey Lydia; you're growing up."

The young girl nodded carelessly. "But I wanted to talk to you about taking the reservation, not about me."

"I guess we'd better do that another time. I don't want you to scold me."

"Scold you!" Lydia paused in her astonishment. "Why, I love you as much as I do anybody in the world. How could I scold you?"

Levine looked down into the shadowy, childish eyes. "Couldn't you? Well, you're a dear, anyhow. Now scoot and I'll watch till you reach the gate."

Lydia hesitated. She felt a change in John's manner and wondered if she had hurt his feelings. "Kiss me good night, then," she said. "You don't do it as regularly as you used to. If I don't watch you, you'll be finding some one else to travel with you."

John turned the little face up and kissed her gently on the forehead, but Lydia, with rare demonstrativeness, threw her arms around his neck and kissed his lips with a full, childish smack.

"There!" she said complacently. "Come on, Adam! Don't wait, Mr. Levine. I'm safe with Adam."

But John Levine did wait, standing with his hand against his lips, his head bowed, till he heard the gate click. Then he lifted his face to the stars. "God," he whispered, "why do You make me forty-five instead of twenty-five?"

CHAPTER IX

The Election

It rained on election day, a cold November drizzle. The day was a legal holiday and even the saloons were closed. Yet Lake City was full of drunken men by noon.

There were a great number of Indians in town that day, big dark fellows in muddy moccasins and faded mackinaws, who stood about watching the machinations of the whites without audible comments.

Toward night the rain stopped and Lydia begged her father to take her into town to see the parade that would be instituted in honor of the victorious party. Nine o'clock found the two at the square with a great waiting crowd. There were very few women in the crowd. Those that Lydia saw were painted and loud-voiced. Amos told her vaguely that they were "hussies" and that she was not to let go of his arm for an instant.

Lydia didn't know what a hussy was, but she didn't want to stir an inch from her father's side because of her fear of drunken men.

It was close on ten o'clock when the sound of a drum was heard from the direction of the Methodist church. Binny Bates, the barber, in a stovepipe hat, mounted on a much excited horse, rode up the street. Binny was a Levine man and the crowd broke into cheers and catcalls.

After Binny came the band, playing for dear life. "Hail the Conquering Hero," and after the band, two and two, a great line of citizens with kerosene torches. After the torches came the transparencies: "Levine Wins!" "The Reservation Is Ours." "Back to the Land, Boys!" "We've Dropped the White Man's Burden."

And following the transparencies came a surprise for crowd and paraders alike. Close on the heels of the last white man strode Charlie Jackson, with a sign, "The Land Is Ours! You Have Robbed I's!" and after Charlie perhaps a hundred Indians, tramping silently two by two.

For a moment the crowd was surprised into silence. Then a handful of mad caught Charlie's sign and a group of college students, with a shout of "Break up the line! Break up the line," broke into the ranks of the Indians and in a moment a free-for-all fight was on.

Amos rushed Lydia down a side street and upon a street car. "Well! Well! Well!" he kept chuckling. "John ate 'em alive! Well! Well!"

"How soon will the Indians have to get off the reservation?" asked Lydia.

"Oh, in a year or so! John's got to get a bill through congress, you know."

"Oh." Lydia gave a great sigh of relief; a year or so was a very long time. She decided to forget the Indians' trouble and rejoice in Levine's triumph.

Charlie Jackson was taciturn for a week or so, then he played brilliantly in the Thanksgiving football game and at the banquet which followed he was his old and genial self.

After Christmas Lydia began seriously to consider how she could earn the twenty-five dollars that her share in the camping trip would cost. One

One Saturday Afternoon She Went to Call on Ma Norton.

(in January) Saturday afternoon she went to call on Ma Norton.

"Who's going to chaperon you children?" she asked Lydia.

"Miss Towne."

"Who of the boys and girls are going?"

"Charlie and Kent and Olga and I. Margery's crazy to go, only her mother hasn't given in yet. If she does go, we'll ask Gustus Bach too."

"It would be nice for you to have the camping trip, dear," said ma. "You've had so little to do with children of your own age. I suppose you're worrying over the money end?"

Lydia nodded. "That's what I wanted to talk to you about. Every spring you get some one in to help you clean house. If you'll do it Easter vacation, this year, and let me help, why, that would be a couple of dollars, wouldn't it?"

Ma Norton looked at the slender little figure and thought of the heavy carpet-beating, the shoving of furniture, the cleaning of mattresses that the stout old colored man hustled through for her every spring. Then she recalled the little figure that had nightly trudged two miles delivering milk rather than take Billy's school books as a gift. And Ma Norton smiled a little ruefully as she said:

"All right, you can help me instead of old Job and I'll pay you five dollars."

"Five dollars for what?" asked Billy as Lydia came in the side door, unheeded.

His mother explained the situation. Billy listened attentively, warming his hands at the stove.

"If I didn't have so much to do at home," said Lydia, "I could work here Saturdays and Sundays and earn a little that way."

"Well, you wouldn't, you know," growled Billy.

Lydia and Ma Norton looked up, startled at his tone.

"For the land's sake, Billy, why not?" exclaimed ma.

"Because Lydia's getting too big now to do these hired-girl stunts. It was bad enough when she was little. But folks'll never forget 'em and always think of her as a hired girl if she keeps on."

Lydia gasped and turned scarlet. Ma Norton stared at her son as if she never had seen him before. Strong and blonde and six feet tall, he seemed suddenly to his mother no longer a boy but a mature man, and a very handsome one at that. He was looking at Lydia now with the curious expression of understanding that she always brought to his gray eyes.

Lydia's voice suddenly quivered. "Then how can I earn money?"

"Dead easy! You make the best fudge in the world. Put some for sale in the University book store. I'm clerking there an hour every day."

"The very thing!" cried Ma Norton.

"Billy, you are a duck!" shrieked Lydia.

"Gimme something to eat, ma, before I go out to milk," said Billy, with a grin that struggled to be modest.

Billy's suggestion proved indeed to be a happy one. He was a willing pack horse and middleman for Lydia, and though the demand for fudge was never overwhelming, Lydia by the end of May had cleared something over thirty-five dollars.

Her joy over this method of earning money was not confined to its relation to her camping trip. She saw herself helping to pay up their indebtedness to Levine. Marshall having made good his threat to call in the note.

HOUND MOURNS LOST MASTER

STANDS AWAITING CALL OF ONE HE LOVED

Marquette Game Warden Leaves One Sincere Friend in Wolf Hound He Hunted With

Over in Kenton, Michigan, a big wolf hound paces restlessly about an enclosure, sniffing the air, listening for the call that always brought him bounding to the door.

Not since he was brought, a lonesome pup from the Kentucky kennel has Mike known such unhappiness. His world has stopped. There is no sunrise. In his dumb, dog-fashion he has sensed overwhelming disaster.

Mike's god is dead.

When the trees were bursting into leaf last April the wolf hound arrived at the cnmp of Emil Skoglund, the state trapper, killed recently by a gnme violator.

That first week in the north country, the dog spent at his master's headquarters at Schmeltz' camp, south of Ishpeming. It was a time when man and dog were getting aquainted with each ather.

Skoglund had neither wife nor child. Day by day, Mike entrenched himself in his master's affections, for he was no ordinary dog. Taken out on a leash to inspect the trap lines the big fellow tugged and strained for freedom when he got the scent of coyotes or wolv

On his very first day on the lines, Mike came upon a coyote caught in the trap and killed him, though he had a front leg chewed in the fight.

He had not been trained to hunting and killing coyotes and wolves but Mike understood his master's teaching in an uncanny fashion. During the first month he killed four coyotes.

Early this spring Mike took up a wolf scent that he followed for days without food. He kept an tho heels of his enemy until he was nearly famished himself, before his master caught up with him and took him off the trail.

The dog is large for a hound and that added weight has spelled defeat for more than one coyote and wolf. Tho trapper had trained the dog to keep away from fights with his own kind, and "Mike" has never been known to so forget his dignity and teaching as to participate in a dog fight. His loyal heart has no quarter, though, for the wolf and coyote.

Chained in the ear or camp, Mike would guard the trapper's possessions from all marauders. It is a certainty that the big hound was not with his master the night of his disappearence.

As the days lengthened into a week, the certainty grew that Emil Skoglund and Arvid Erickson, county game wardens, had been killed while on duty and that the story might have been written differently if Mike had been along. At least the murderers would have borne the identification marks of Mike's powerful fangs. While there was a bit of fight left in him, the dog would not have permitted anyone to touch his master.

Sam Bennett, a brother-in-law of the trapper, has taken Mike to Kenton. The Bennetts are doing everything they can to make the dog contented and happy. He appreciates their efforts and tries to show them he does, for Mike is a gentleman.

But Mike's manners are not proof against his hunger to see Skoglund. He cannot keep from running to every stranger and looking him over as if he would glean news of the absent one.

Brooding, Mike watches the road. These golden days are such as spelled heaven to Mike when he and his god tramped the woods on the line of duty, doing work that was play. The dog can't understand why Emil Skoglund, who never neglected him before stays away now. Humans look at him pityingly and turn away from the dumb entreaty in the wolf hound's eyes.

The red nnd gold woods have no lure. They garnish a drab and uninteresting world. Humans may fight their way back from sorrow, but for a dog his master's smile and praises, the pat on the head makes up the world. There is nothing for Mike now hut dumb misery. His god is dead. —Marquette Mining Journal.

FISHERMEN CAPTURE AN AMERICAN EAGLE

Bird with a Wing Spread of Seven Feet Cannot Fly

Rolla Ramsby, B. D. Owens and others of Alanson were out fishing the first of last week. Mr. Ramsby had gone to shore and his attention was nttracted to some thing making a peculiar noise in the brush. He called to his friends to come to help investigate.

They circled around it and in a few minutes Mr. Ramsby came out of the brush, carrying a large American eagle. They brought it hома nnd Owens now has it in a largo box.

As yet they have not beon able to tell what is the matter with the bird, hut it could not fly, only hop. On renching home, Mr. Owens telephoned to the State Dcpnrtment of Conservntion nnd on Monday a game warden eame to sea tha bird.

The bird's wings when spread measure abaut seven feet. They think it is a yaung one, as it is not bald yet. It is a fine speelmen af our national bird.—Harbor Springs Graphle.

FIRE DESTROYS ECCLESTON HOME

Blaze Nearly Traps All Three Members of Family

The following taken from the Petoskey Evening News of recent issue will interest friends of the Eccleston family:

"An alarm from box number 15 at about 2:30 o'clock Sunday morning summoned the fire department to the home of Guy Eccleston, 924 Michigan street, where a fire had gained considerable headwny before being discovered. The origin of the fire is unknown, but it appears to have started in the basement.

"Mr. Eccleston and his two sons were sleeping in a down-stnirs bedroom, and when he was nwakened by the noise of the flames, there was no way of escaping from the room except through the window. The older of the boys aroused the neighbors, one of whom turned in the alarm, while the father gathered up a few articles of wearing apparel that were in the bedroom.

"The department made a quick run nnd soon had two lines of hose strung, but the blaze was a stubborn one and completely gutted the inside of the house before brought under control. The firemen did not leave the scene until about five o'clock.

"In addition to the furniture and clothing, Mr. Eccleston lost some currency and several pieces of jewelry. A part of the loss is covered by insurance.

"The house is owned by Mr. and Mrs. Grant Keiser and is said to be a total loss, although there was some insurance."

DILL ASSORTING TIME is here. Bring your 5-gallon jugs to the Pickle station or phone 25-J.—Adv. 44t1.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH
B. G. Maltson, D. D., Minister

Morning worship, at 10:30 with sermon by the pastor on "The Dynamic Conception of Life." Sunday school at 12:00. The evening service hours are changed half-hour earlier as follows: Young People's meetings, Senior and Junior at 6:00 and evening church service at 7:00. Tho pastor will give the last in the series of talks on "The Conflicts of Early Christianity with the Heathen Empire." The topic for next Sunday evening will be "The Last Struggle and the Final Victory." Wright-Spidel Nuptials Celebrated in East Jordan

A quiet wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Wright of East Jordan, Saturday, October 30, at 8:00 p. m., when their daughter, Paula, was united in marriage to Everett R. Spidel, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. O. Spidel, also of East Jordan.

They were attended by Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Davis, sister and brother-in-law of the groom. The bride was nttired in pale green beaded crepe and carried a boquet of roses, while the bridesmaid wore a gown of black velvet.

The ceremony was performed by Rev. Hufton of the M. E. church of that city, after which a wedding supper was served to about 30 immediate friends and relatives. Many lovely gifts were received.

Oat-of-town guests were Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Davis of Grand Rapids, Mr. and Mrs. John Cunninghnm and Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Geary of Traverse City, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Montgomery and Mr. and Mrs. John Montgomery of Bellaire.

The young couple left immediately for a short trip and will be at home to their many friends after November 25 in Grand Rapids.

Radiola 20, with five Radiotrons $115

RCA Loudspeaker 100 $35

THIS Radiola-20 is one of the tried, tested and perfected RCA Radiolas that are far in advance of their day. It has five tubes—dry battery tubes that take very little current from the batteries—cost little to buy and little to run. But the last tube is a power tube that gives you volume with true reproduction. And for distance, when the number of tubes counts, it has a special sensitizing control that makes the five tubes as sensitive as mueh bigger sets.

For musical quality—and for fine performance—Radiola 20 has no competitor anywhere near it in price.

BEAVER ISLAND TO HAVE DEER

COTTAGE OWNER FROM DETROIT BEHIND PROJECT

Conditions Found Favorable and State Will Probably Place Herd oo Island

A recent issue of the Courier contained the story of the organization of the Beaver Island Game Protective Club, and out-lined their plans for stocking the Island lakes with fish and the possibility of putting a herd of deer on the island.

We are publishing below n letter received from H. W. Bundy of Detroit, who owns a cottage on the island, and is also deeply interested in the future success of the club. We believe that if this spirit could be transplanted to the mainland and put into usefulness in our own lakes, streams and woods, we would have better fishing and hunting than we now enjoy. Mr. Bundy's letter follows:

November 3, 1926

The Editor,
Charlevoix Courier,
Charlevoix, Michigan.

"My dear sir:

Mr. Ed. Deuell, District Warden, Boyne City, Michigan, sent me a clipping from your paper with reference to the organization on Beaver Island of the Beaver Island Game Protective Club. As you know, I own a cottage on the Island and spend a good deal of time in the summer at this cottage. My principal sport is fishing, and while the fishing is always good, I believe that with the proper care and attention the lakes can be stocked and kept in the finest condition for very good sport. With this in view I have used my influence on the Island among the boys to get them to help me not only to observe all conservation laws but also asked them to go further than that and not to use gang hooks in fishing; to use nothing but single hooks; and next year I am going to iotroduce the barhless hook. I believe that a good fisherman should give a fighting fish all the chance in the world to get oway and when he lands them under these conditions he is entitled to his fish. I had some visitors to the Island this summer and they remarked what a wonderful place it would be for deer. I then wrote to Chief Deputy Jones ut Lansing, Michigan asking him if he would have one of his officers make a report on the advisability of putting deer on the Island: That if the cover was right I would personally buy a small herd as a starter. Mr. Jones very kindly had Mr. Deuell make a report to him and later advised me that the state had some deer that they might put on theIsland if all things were favorable. As it stands today we expect a small herd of deer from the state, but, I knew that unless we had the support of all the boys on the Island there would be no use trying to stock it with any kind of game.

"As you say, the Island is a beautiful spot and may one day be a very fine summer resort. However that may be, I am personally not interested in n summer resort but I am interested in seeing wild animals in their natural state. I am not a hunter and probably never will be but I do love to roam the woods, particularly where there is plenty of game. I am writing this to you because I note in the clipping sent me that you are ready with your paper to back up any movement that will improve the Island and I want you to know what my interests are and what I have in mind.

"Won't you let me thank you for your unsolicited cooperation in giving our project such favorable publicity.

Yours very truly
H. W. Bundy, President,
Bundy Tubing Company."

BENJ. BROWN BUYS EMREY CLOTHING STORE

Will Dispose of Entire Stock By Special Sale

A deal was closed on Thursday of last week which means the selling of stock and fixtures and the closing of one of Charlevoix's oldest business places, the Emrey Clothing Store. Benjamin Brown is the buyer and before the month is out he will place the entire stock on sale nnd close out the business.

In another section of the Courier Mr. Brown makes his formal announcement of the coming sale. Not only will he sell the Emrey stock, but will include his own entire stock of heavy winter garments, which is a large one.

The sale will result in one of the largest selling events Charlevoix people have had the opportunity of partleipating in, and coming just before the heavy holiday buying season, will without doubt be a most successful one.

TURKEY MEAT WILL COME HIGH

WILL BE MORE COSTLY THAN IN FORMER YEARS

Predicted Price Will Run From 45 to 48 Cents Per Pound—Looks Like a Bear Raid

Thanksgiving turkey eating will be somewhat more costly this year than in the past two years, according to a holiday prediction. The turkey crop is not as large as it was last year or the year before, and a prediction of 45 to 48 cents a pound for this year's Thanksgiving turkey is not considered pessimistic.

The cool weather this fall has been favorable "turkey weather." So loog as the days and the nights are comparatively warm, turkeys continue to roam the country and fail to put on flesh. When the temperature falls, they are content to cease wandering off, and settle down to grain feeding which rapidly adds pounds of turkey meat. The crop generally is further advanced than at this time in several years, and reports from the country consistently tell of the high quality of the turkeys. Io Texas, which is the big early state for turkeys, the crop is believed to exceed last year when many of the young goults were lost during the hot dry summer. Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, Iowa and Ohio are expected to have fewer turkeys for the market this season while the other states report flocks of nbout the same size last year.

Stocks of turkeys in storage are less than half as large as at this time a year ago and 40 percent below the five-year average. Reserves of frozen turkeys, therefore, will be less of a market factor this season than last. Holdings of chickens and fowls are five million pounds larger than a year ago and ten million pounds larger than the five-year average, however, offsetting to some degree the decline in turkeys.

SOCIETY TO AID CRIPPLED CHILD

HELP THE UNFORTUNATE IS THEIR BATTLE CRY

Special "Eorollment Week" for Membership Begios Week of November First

About five years ago a group of business and professional men, thankful for their own success in life, and desirous of showing their gratitude in a practical way, became inspired with the idea of doing something for the unfortunate kiddies at the University of Michigan hospital. After a trip through the ward, their interest converged toward the more partieular problem of the crippled child, for while the state had been quite generous in providing for deaf, blind and sub-normal children, it had done little or nothing for the crlpple.

It is probable that this trip was a revelation to most of these men. Seeing these innocent youngsters some with features drawn by constant pain, others with shining, sunny countenances, but all with twisted and crippled bodies which must be swung around on crutches, enveloped in plaster casts, or even strapped motionless to frames for months at a time, must have brought tears to the eyes of more than one of tbem.

At any rate, from this beginning has grown the Michigan Society for Crippled Children, an organization which has done wonders toward easing the lot of many of these little ones. For with proper care the majority of these seemingly hopeless cripples are restored to society as able and self supporting citizens. It has also done much in providing recreational facilities working in conjunction with luncheon clubs, etc., principally the Rotary.

We cannot all experience the thrill that must come to the men who pioncered this wonderful movement, but we all have the opportunity of expressing our gratitude for the things we have received in much the same manner. During Thanksgiving week each person is asked to pay one dollar for membership in his County Society, now being organized, the need for which is evident in every section of the state. Of the 13,000 or more crippled children in Michigan, only a small percentage have been reached. The money will make possible an aggressive campaign to search out cases, decide how best to cure them, and trace them through to completion.

The Thanksgiving enrollment is being directed by the Michigan Society for Crippled Children, which has offices at Aon Arbor. Hugh E. Vande Walker, of Ypsilanti, is president and Miss Alberta Chase, Ann Arbor, executive secretary.

SEASON'S FINAL HERE SATURDAY

LOCALS TAKE ON CHEBOYGAN IN LAST GAME OF SEASON

C. H. S. Eleveo Hopes to Offset String of Defeats By Fioal Victory.

Charlevoix high school football team was idle last Saturday with no game on their schedule, and spent the time in practice preparatory to the last home game with Cheboygan here Saturday. While snow and cold weather is interfering with practice, Coach Buehen is coaching his men in fundamentals in the high school basement and hopes to turn in and win in the final game this week. The locals have failed to win a game this season in six encounters, the nearest to a win being a tie game game with Harbor Springs. While they are now looking forward to a successful season next year with a large number of veterans in the line-up, a win in the closing game is their final goal.

Petoskey's blue and white outfit found plenty of difficulty in defeating Cadillac at the latter city last Saturday, but with the breaks in their favor in the final quarter, they scored 9 points on a drop kick and a touchdown in the final moments of the game. With all the dope pointing to a victory for Petoskey, the northern boys found it no easy matter to defend their no-defeat record for the year. Cadillac scored her two points on a touchback. Petoskey meets Alpena Saturday and then take on Traverse City the 20th.

East Jordan streogthened ner claim on the class C championship of northern Michigan circuit with a 38 to 0 win over Mancelona last Saturday at Enst Jordan. The East Jordan outfit has lost but two games this season, these to Petoskey and Boyne City of the larger schools.

Cheboygan showed locals what kind of football they can expect here Saturday when they defeatod Harbor Springs 13 to 0 last Saturday. Cheboygan has suffered only one loss this year aod that early in the season to Alpeoa.

Manistee's footbal! eleven upset the dope last Soturday by giving Trnverse City a 12 to 0 trimming. This is Traverse City's first defeat by a district team and will probably spur them to desperate efforts to win from Petoskey n week from Saturday.

TWO DIG WAY OUT OF EMMET JAIL

Chisel Hole Through Rear aod Make Their Escape

Digging n hole through the west end of the county jail sometime during the night, Pete Sineway, Indian, held for driving while drunk, and Louis Graham, Indian, held fnr alleged receiving of stolen property, escaped sometime between Sunday evening and Monday morning. Their disappearance was discovered in the morning says the Petoskey Evening News.

Just how the pair secured tools with which to dig out the brick wall is not known, Mrs. Carpenter, matron of the jail said Monday, but somehow they managed to make a hole large enough to squeeze through.

Two other prisoners, Avery and Baker, also enjoying the freedom of the jail without being locked in cells, refused to take advantage of the chance to escape.

PIONEER MERCHANT CALLED

SEVRIN ORLOWSKI DIES AT ADVANCED AGE OF 76 YEARS

Was Founder of the Firm of S. Orlowski & Son, One of City's Successful Eoterprises.

Sevrin Orlowski, pioneer Charlevoix business man and a resident of this vicinity for forty years, died at his home, 801 Bridge street, last Wednesday afternoon at 5:00 o'clock. He had been failing in health for quite u length of time and had not been actively engaged in business for a number of years.

Deceased was born in the Province of Posen, Poland, January 1, 1850. He came to this country with his parents when a youog man and lived in Clevelnod, Ohio, for a considerable length of time. Ahout forty years ago the family left Cleveland, moving onto a farm in Hayes township, being numbered among the pioneers of that section, and enduring the many hardships and privations with which the early settlers were confronted in those days. After about ten years on the farm, Mr. Orlowski moved to Charlevoix and entered business. From a small beginning Mr. Orlowski's business increased in volume until he was recognized as one of the leading merchants of the city. He retired from active participation in the firm of S. Orlowski & Son about three years ago and at this time the business was taken by his son, Louis, who now conducts the store.

He was united in marriage to Miss Margaret O'Leary, August 15, 1874. Besides his widow, he is survived by one son, Louis S. Orlowski of this city, three daughters, Miss Mary Orlowski of Charlevoix; Mrs. Agnes Tallman of Detroit; and Mrs. Josephine Madill, of Charlevoix; also three grandchildren, Mary and Louis Orlowski, Jr., and Edwin Madill, all of this city.

Funeral services were held last Saturday morning at 10:30 from the Catholic church, of which Mr. Orlowski was a faithful and devoted member, three priests being in attendanee at the solemn requiem service.

During the years of his residence in this city, Mr. Orlowski has won an enviable reputation for honesty in business and personal affairs, a quality which won him the respect and close friendship of n large numbar of people.

FIRST DEBATE NEXT FRIDAY

C. H. S. NEGATIVE TEAM WILL MEET ONAWAY

First of a Series of Four Preliminary Debates Sponsored By Mich. H. S. Debating League

Charlevoix high school on the negative will debate Onaway high school on the affirmative in the latter city on Friday evening, November 19th, 1926.

The subject of this debate is "Resolved, That the United States Government Should Own the Coal Mines."

The team that will represent our high school in this debate on November 19th, is being coached by Prin. Oscar North, who is a member of the high school faculty.

Charlevoix high school will bo represented at Onaway by Francis Martin, Norman Shanahan, Charles Sterritt nnd Kelth Reynolds, tba negutive team. The affirmative team is composed of Georgia Kelderhouse, Larue Higman, Donald Swinton and Helen Richardson.

On this same date, November 19th, 220 high schools of the state, (all members of the Michigan High School Debating League), will meet in 110 debates in which 660 high school pupils will participate. Tho subject of all these debates will be, "Resolved, That the United States Government Shouhl Own the Coal Mines."

These debates on November 19th, will be the first of the four preliminary debates sponsored by the Michigan High School Debating League. The remaining three preliminary debntes will he held on the following dates:

Second—December 10th, 1926.
Third—Jnnuary 14th, 1927.
Fourth—Febrnnry 11th, 1927.

After the 220 high schools have participnted in these four preliminary debates, the schools with the highest records will enter the elimination series of debates. These elimination series will, by successiva debates, eliminate all schools except two which will go to Ann Arhor for the final state championship debato in May.

In the final state championship debate, held in Hill Auditorium at Ann Arbor on May 10th last year, Kalamazoo Central high school won first honors and Hudson high school won second honors.

The nudience assembled for this state championship debate numbered two thousand five hundred people, representatives of the different high schools of the state, which is the largest audience that ever attended a championship dehate of the league. Sixty-three high schools and two colleges were represented in the nudience by one or more delegutes.

The Michignn High School Debating League was organized by the board of regents of the University of Michigan in 1917, and this year begins its tenth year of activity.

PETOSKEY PIONEER MERCHANT IS DEAD

Was City's Oldest Store Owner aod Resident Since 1875

Adoph Fochtman, Petoskey's oldest merchant nnd founder of the Fochman Department Stores, died last Friday morning in that city.

He had been in business in the same location on Mitchell street since 1876 and, until his last recent illness, had retained an nctive interest in the operation of the store.

Mr. Fochtman located in Petoskey in 1875 from St. Mary's, Pennsylvania, and the following year npened his generni store. He saw the business grow with each exceeding year. For many years the family occupied the second floor of the store building. Later the family home was erected and the store enlarged to include the second floor. Later a three-story brick structure was built, and this was rebuilt, following the fire of some years ago.

Mr. Fochtman has been in failing health for the last three years but his passing was hastened by a recent hard fall and the breaking of a bona in one of his hipa. Everything possible was dono to relieve this injury but his advanced age was against him.

Cortez in New Role Clean Collars Taboo

One of the things Ricardo Cortez likes best about the role he plays in "Volcano!" William K. Howard's newest production for Paramount, is that he does not appear throughout the picture as the immaculate hero.

So far during the screen career of this sensational young actor it almost invariably has been his fate to be seen before the camera only faultlessly groomed. Cortez's first chance to break away from a monotonous series of "white collar" parts came when James Cruze selected him for the leading male role in "The Pony Express."

In the latter part of "Volcano!" which comes to the Palace Theatre on November 17 and 18th. Cortez is given another opportunity to appear in general disarray, fight a villian, get his clothes torn, his face and knuckles cut, and enjoy himself generally.

THE MILLIONAIRE SECRET

To be a millionaire, a man must not only get rich; he must be able to stay rich. A certain well-known millionaire, when asked how he stayed rich, said: "I invest my money only in sound, established companies."

That man has learned a valuable secret. But a man's money, however much he has, is never worth so much to him as his mind, his intelligence.

Has it ever occurred to you that you should invest your intelligence just as carefully as you invest your money?

Why not invest your intelligence in a sound company by subscribing to the Youth's Companion? It is the oldest magazine for young people in the world—and nearly the oldest of all the American magazines. It is also one of the most interesting. Practically every famous author of the past hundred years has written at one time or another for the Companion. Only this fall, for example, the Companion published a new story by Jack London. Do you like stories of adventure? Mystery? Romance? They are all in the Youth's Companion.

Here are the terms of an investment guaranteed to be profitable:

1. The Youth's Companion—52 issues in 1927, and
2. The remaining issues of 1926. All for only $2.
3. Or include McCall's Magazine, the monthly authority on fashions. Both publications, only $2.50.

PONTIAC SIX $825 SEDAN or COUPE

Thousands of users are enjoying the qualities of power, stamina, acceleration and comfort which establish the Pontiac Six as such a revolutionary value. And in addition, they are discovering that it either costs less to operate the Pontiac Six than smaller cars of less recent design, or that the difference is so slight as to be negligible.

In view of the thrilling performance abilities with which it is combined, such inexpensive upkeep is an expressive example of the brilliant engineering which has helped to make the Pontiac Six the most popular car of its type ever introduced.

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

In the meantime she expended the whole of her four dollars on a pair of buckskin outing boots and eight dollars on a little corduroy hunting coat and skirt. The suit was cheap but well cut, with belt and pockets and welted seams. The soft buckskin shoes fitted the slender calves like velvet. With her bright cheeks and her yellow hair above the fawn-colored corduroy, Lydia looked half boy, half woman.

"My soul, Lydia, they're just grand!" cried Lizzie.

"What boys are going in that crowd?" demanded Amos.

"Charlie and Kent and—Margery's mother's given in—Gustus Bacb. I told you. Daddy, don't you like the suit?"

"Like it!" exclaimed Amos. "Lydia, I'm stunned by it! I wish I could have bought you your first suit myself, Lydia. But on a dollar and a half a day, I swan—"

Lydia spun through her junior examination blissfully. For once marks and final averages were of little importance to her. For the week after school closed she was going camping!

Amos had been very sober when he said good-by to Lydia, at half past six. "It's your first trip, Lydia. Don't do anything you wouldn't want your mother to see."

Lydia looked at him wonderingly, then threw her arms about his neck. "Oh, daddy, I don't want to go off and leave you two whole weeks!"

"It's too late to back out now. Go on and have a good time," said Amos, picking up his dinner pail. Lydia watched him down the road. Suddenly she realized how lonely her father must be without her mother.

Promptly at nine Charlie and Kent whirled up to the gate in a carryall.

"Here come Miss Towne and Olga!" cried Kent. "Margery'll be late, of course."

At nine-fifteen Margery was driven up in state by Elviry, and at nine-twenty the carryall was off to the north in a cloud of dust, leaving Adam howling dismally at the gate.

"Where the hills begin again, that's the reservation," said Charlie. "Just beyond that group of buildings is the reservation line."

The buildings Charlie pointed to were the first that had appeared in several miles. A two-story, unpainted frame house with several barns and sheds comprised the group. There was a sign on the front of the house.

"Last Chance," read Margery, as they clattered by. "For goodness' sake!" she giggled, "is it a hotel?"

"Look at all the women! One in every window!" cried Olga. "Why, they must have a lot of maids! Do people come up here in the summer, Kent?"

Kent gave Miss Towne an appealing glance.

"It's a miserable, disreputable place, girls," said the teacher. "Why look at that when you have these beautiful hills before you?—How far into the reservation do we go, Charlie?"

"About four miles. It's where I camp every year."

The road, curving around a hill, had without warning entered the pine woods.

The others fell to chatting again. But Lydia was too moved for words. The incense of the pines, their curious murmuring stillness, roused in her memories that were perhaps half racial. She was still in a half dream when the blue of a lake glimmered beyond the far aisles and the carryall drew up with a flourish before three tents set in the pines on the water's edge.

Charlie and Kent had made their preparations well and they displayed them proudly. They had rented the three old A tents from the agent, as well as the seven canvas cots, the dishes and the cooking utensils. The middle tent had been arranged with a rough slab table and benches for a dining and living room. The boys' tent with three cots and the girls' with four, were crowded but comfortable.

"It's very nice, indeed, boys," said Miss Towne. "Come, girls, get out your aprons. I suppose you're all starved."

"Wait! Wait!" cried Kent. "That's not the way this camp's going to be run. Charlie, Gustus and me do the cooking. You ladies are company and don't have to do anything except wash the dishes and make your own beds.

"I think that's a very nice arrangement," decided Miss Towne. "Come, girls, let's unpack and arrange the tent."

There was a very early pairing off in the camp. Kent devoted himself to Olga, Gustus to Margery and Charlie to Lydia. Kent and Olga kept the camp supplied with fish. Excepting at meal time and the bathing hour, they spent the day in a birch-bark canoe on the lake.

Charlie undertook to show Lydia the reservation as the Indians knew it. If Lydia was a little puzzled by his eagerness to make her understand conditions on the reservation, she gave little thought to the riddle.

They visited one or two neat Indian farms, but for the most part Charlie led her from one wick-i-up to the other, deep set in recesses of the wood, where the only whites to intrude on the Indians were the occasional government wood cruisers. These wick-i-ups were hovels, usually in the last stages of poverty and desolation.

One day they came to a wick-i-up where there were three children besides the father and mother. Two of the children were half blind with eye trouble. The whole family was sitting in the sun, about a pot of fish. The grown-ups chatted eagerly with Charlie, and he translated for Lydia.

"They say it's been a fearful winter. They only had ten dollars this year out of their government allowance and they couldn't get work. The baby froze to death or starved, or both. We'll bring some food over to these folks, Lydia, because there are kids—eh?"

"But, Charlie, what's the government allowance?"

"Oh, didn't you know?—and you're one of the white lords of creation, too! The government set aside this land for the Indians in solemn trenty with them, for ever and ever. Then it deliberately sold off a big block of it and deposited the money at Washington. The income from this was to be given to the Indians. There's over two million dollars there. But by the time it's filtered from Washington to the Indians, this is the result." He nodded at the half-starved group about the fish pot.

Lydia had had four days of this. As they made their way back to the camp for supper she said to him, in an unsteady voice, "Charlie, I can't stand it! Think of that baby that froze to death. And all these beautiful woods are full of half-starved Indians! What can I do about it, Charlie?"

"You can't do anything. It's too late. But I wanted you to see. I don't care what girl understands as long as you do. I think an awful lot of you, Lydia."

He took Lydia's hand and patted it. Lydia looked up at him, thrilled by his bronze beauty and the note in his voice.

"If I were a white man," said Charlie, "I'd make you love me and marry me. But I'm an Indian and sooner or later I'll go back to my people. I'm just making believe I can play the white man's game for a while." He eyed Lydia wistfully. "But we'll be friends, eh, Lydia?—Always? Even if I go back to the wick-i-up, you'll be my friend?"

"Oh, yes, Charlie, always," replied Lydia, earnestly, even while there flashed through her head the half whimsical thought, "Queer kinds of men want to be friends with me, Mr. Levine, Mr. Marshall, and Charlie. And they all hate each other!"

After this episode, Charlie was less strenuous about showing Lydia Indian conditions. That night he resumed a

ANNOUCEMENT

We have recently secured the agency for the A. H. Grebe and Company line of Radio Receivers. This receiver has features that no other receiver on the market has incorporated in its construction. In performance it is second to none. And there are definite and easily understood reasons why this is so. Back of these is Grebe construction—the standard of the industry. Every part of the Grebe set is designed and made in the Grebe factory.

GREBE BINOCULAR COILS

Guarantee "Selective Sensitivity" or the power to get a desired station, and keep undesired stations from breaking through.

GREBE LOW-WAVE EXTENSION CIRCUITS

Enable the Synchrophase to receive stations down to 150 meters. This means that it will tune-in over 100 existing low-wave stations with worthwhile programs, not now availalbe to other receivers.

GREBE COLORTONE

With it you may vary to your taste the quality of speech or music, from high thin pitch to low, deep round tones, with all variations between, without changing the positions of the dials or losing the full strength of the broadcast signals. It is also possible to suppress, to a great extent, disturbances due to static.

GREBE VOLUME CONTROL

In the SYNCHROPHASE a complete and continuous range of sound intensity from all stations, is at your disposal, without any distortion or change in the character of the sound.

GREBE FLEXIBLE-UNIT CONTROL

Enable you to set two or all three dials by operating one; or to adjust all three separately, at will.

The GREBE SYNCHROPHASE will give you everything that Radio has to offer. Hear it.

OLD TIME SHARKS

In the good old days, when sharpers were practically allowed to roam at will throughout the state, the rural districts were constantly being invaded by gangs of the nimble-fingered fraternity, one of their favorite pastimes being the old soap trick. There was a lend man in the crowd, whose job it was to sell little bars of soap to the natives at five and ten dollars a cake. He was always accompanied by a few eappers to start business off and after that the rast was easy. Settling down on a main corner in the village, the leader would proceed to wrap ten and twenty dollar bills with each package of soap, leaving a carner of tha bill protruding from the wrapper. Up would step on of their gang, purchase a cake for five dollars and in the presence of the gaping crowd proceed to extract a twenty dollar hill. The way the hoys back home would fall for the g[illegible] was a sight to make the angels in heaven weep, they fairly fell over each other to put up five dollars for the torn corner off a twenty thnt had heen cleverly substituted for the original bill right before their eyes.

The law finally chased the old gang out of husiness, but in their place have come the modern slicker who exhibits beautiful colored stock certificates, with seven per cent pnyable in gold-printed in big letters ncross the face, and the wise boys of this day and generation fall for it as did their forbears for the soap trick a couple of decades ago. Every community can use for legitimate purposes its surplus capital. It is always a good plan to invest your savings where you can see them every day, if you desire. And should you wish to put your money in outside ventures, there is always one unfailing rule to follow—CONSULT YOUR BANKER FIRST.

FARM ELECTRICITY

The Michigan State Grange, during its annual meeting at the Michigan State College tha latter part of October, went on record as favoring tha development of water power rights in the state. We believe that many of the delegates to the convention endorsed the resolution in the belief that it meant the development of electricity for rural use, and not for the purpose of engaging the state in public utility ownership.

Farmers, who are interested in the farm power idea for the use of electricity on the farms, and not for political purposes, should follow closely the construction of an experimental farm power line which is now being built out of Mason, in Ingham county. When this line is completed it is the purpose of the power company to turn it over to Michigan State College experts for study as to the practicability of electricity for power farming. Under their supervision caretul study will be made, touching every phase of the question, beginning with construction costs and running through to the smallest details in determining the benefits, together with the costs which must ultimately be borne by the consumer. This experiment will be conducted without engaging the public in any large expenditures and will present a perfect guide as to the feasabillty of electrifying the farms of Michigan.

CHECKING DEATH TOLL

During the past nine years 2,149 boys and girls under fourteen years of nge were killed and 2,759 seriously injured, many heing maimed for life while wnlking or playing on railroad tracks and while jumping on or off moving trains. In addition to those killed and injured under fourteen years of age, there were also 2,555 youths between fourteen and twenty-one years of age killed and 4,291 injured in the same manner.

The railroads of the United States are conducting a strenuous campaign to bring to children the dangers of walking or playing on railroad tracks and jumping on and off trains. They have met with considerable success in reducing these accidents during recent years. In the year 1913 there were 1,501 such accidents; in the year 1924 accidents had been reduced to 1,313; in 1925 to 1,301, a decrease of 200 accidents to children in two years.

The railroads are constantly patrolling their property and railroad employes doing their utmost to curb these accidents. However, it is necessary that they have the co-operation of civic and social agencies, superintendents, principals and teachers in schools and parents of children. Also the interest of clergymen, leaders of Boy and Girl Scout movements, officers and members of Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions and other social nad civic clubs and police officers.

AIR, RUM, MILLIONS

It is a clever man who can accumulate a fortune of $5,000,000 five years after being released from the penitentiary, but it is a wary man who does not get caught doing sa.

Frank C. Parker of Chicago, was clever but not wary. In 1921 he emerging from the Joliet penitentiary after serving four years because he had once been the "crown prince" of automobile thieves. Ha discarded automobiles in favor of airplanes. He became a hero. In 1923 a colony of fishermen were trapped by a blizzard on South Fox Island in Lake Michigan. Aviator Parker flew to their aid, carrying food and clothing. In 1924 he was a guarantor of the Carpenter-Gibbons fight at Michigan City, Ind. People wondered whence he had acquired his wealth. Last week he and eight of his employes were indicated as the operatars of 45 breweries and an airplane bootlegging system. Federal agents said that Aviator Parker's transpartation methods had put his profits over $5,000,000 mark.

One of the most worthwhila among the many special weeks of the year is "Fnther and Son Week," which is announced this year for the week of November 7-14. This is a splendid institution, which has grown tremendously of late years, and rightfully so. The movement should receive the encouragement of everyone. It is a week when many things occur to bring fathers closer to their boys, and boys closer to their fnthers. In the modern time in which we find ourselves, this taking nn inventory of parental and filial obligations is a splendid thing.

War Over, But Red Cross Nurses Are Ever On Duty

Has the romantic pictura of tha Red Cross Nurse faded with the war days? It has been more than 12 years since that first contingant of brava woman to go to tha war zone sailed from America to make an undying record of service behind every battle front.

For an answer to their whereabouts today, it is only necessary to refer to any large disaster of recent years in which the Red Cross rendered relief. Wherever there was injury and suffering the Red Cross nurse will be found to have been on active duty.

These nurses are enrolled under the American Red Cross as a reserve of the Army, Navy and U. S. Public Health Service, at all times ready to serve in war or peace. This reserve of Red Cross nurses aggregates 43,506 women who have met the highest standard in the nursing profession.

The Roll Call for membership in the Red Cross this year is November 11 to 25, when the American people identify themselves with the broad services of the organization by joining its ranks

The Women's Christian Temperance Union is scheduled to meet Friday afternoon with Mrs. N. A. Shores, 305 Dixon avenue, Leader, Mrs. Mattson; topic, "Internationalism." The social committee will serve tea after the program.

Clarence N. Wood and wife, who have been in the southern part of the state for the past week, are expected home Tuesday or Wednesday. They visited at Detroit, Grand Rapids, Howell, and attended the foot ball game Saturday between the U. of M. and Wisconsin.

Bridge tenders E. L. Johnson and Harve O'Brien were busy Monday and Tuesday, housing a quantity of new equipment for the Bridge street swing bridge. A majority of the heavy castings and working parts of the bridge will be replaced during the close of navigation.

Charlevoix merchants report heavy sales of large sized collars due to neck swelling. The epidemic usually takes place early in the fall and gradually the number of those afflicted increase until the opening of the hunting season, November 15. After this date the swelling subsides to again appear the next season.

Albert Stanley Houghton and Miss Emily Himebauch were married last Thursday evening at the Baptist parsonage, Rev. Herman Burns performing the ceremony. Mrs. Houghton is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herman Himebauch of Phelps. The groom is employed on the Ingalls farm in Marion township, where the young couple will make their home.

East Jordan claims the Class C football championship for the northern Michigan circuit because of her 38 to 0 victory over Mancelona Saturday at East Jordan. The Pine lake team has won from every small team in the territory including Harbor Springs and Charlevoix, losing games only to Boyne City and Petoskey in the larger school class.

Dr. W. W. Mitchell, wife and children, left Tuesday for Florida, where they will spend the winter. Their exact location is not known, but they expect to make Orlando their permanent headquarters during the time spent in the south. Dr. Mitchell took a greater part of his equipment with him, and will practice dentistry at the point they decide to locate.

TASTE FOR HONEY WAS HIS DOWNFALL

Boyne Falls Excited Over Depredations of Bear

Boyne Falls was awakened from its sleep Nov. 2, with the startling report that a bear with his foot in a trap was on the outskirts of the town. Men and boys were soon on their way to investigate the report. A prominent game warden named Joe was seen to drive in the direction of the disturbance and soon the report arrived that the 300 lb. bear had been dispatched. Hubbard Bros. operate some 400 colonies of bees south of Boyne Falls. On Sunday they discovered signs of bear in their apiary. They borrowed a bear trap and set it in the path the bear had used the first night, but the bear stepped all around that trap ate his honey and went his happy way, then two more traps were placed with great care, the Hubbard's and their ancesters have trapped many years, the neighbors say, and they smeared honey on a post near the battery of traps to induce the bear through its sense of smell to walk into one of the traps. That night, the day before election, one bear came back and carelessly placed a front foot into a trap which was secured with a toggle chain—twelve hours later he was shot to death by the state to prevent further destruction of private property.—Boyne Citizen.

"THE LOST WORLD," Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's stupendous story with Bessie Love, Wallace Beery, Lewis Stone and Lloyd Hughes. See the giant Dinosaur crashing down the streets of London. Take a trip to wonderland—to the lost world—now found. And placed before your eyes in a vivid, startling story of romance and adventure. Come with Prof. Challenger and his band of adventurers. A trip up the Amazon to places never explored by man. Live with them in battles with savage native tribes—missing links pass beyond—to the strange, unknown world of pre-historic monsters as big as fifteen elephants—flying reptiles as big as a aeroplane. Fight for life with them against these monsters of the air, the land and the deep back to London with a caged dinosaur. Flee with them as he snaps his chains and runs wild down the streets, smashing trams and sky-scrapers, crashing through tower bridge. Truly the marvel of the screen. It will hold you breathless, clinging to your seat—a picture you never will forget.

OF INTEREST TO FARMERS

Canning Factory Meeting Well Attended

The meeting held at East Jordan last Friday night for the benefit of growers, who are raising crops for the canning factory, was attended by fifty-five interested farmers.

Prof. G. E. Starr, the main speaker, gave a talk that was wonderfully instructive and helpful. Anticipating the additional facilities for canning small fruits and vegetables, each of the crops were discussed in detail. Prof. Starr spoke very optimistically of the prospects of raspberries, string beans, beets and sweet corn, as profitable crops to raise for the factory.

The speaker spoke for some length on the subject of quality, which is the deciding factor between success and failure and mentioned that the canned goods market has never been glutted with good quality goods, but rather with poorly packed cans. Many new varieties have been developed in the past two or three years, as well as new strains of the same variety and it is up to the factory officials to demand of their grower the right varieties.

The success made by the factory at East Jordan the first year should lead many farmers to begin thinking about the future that this new industry means to the community and with additional equipment another year, they will be able to serve a larger field of activity. But don't forget the success is equally divided between the grower and the management of the factory and that means study, thought and effort.

State Club Leader Visits County

A. G. Kettunen, State Boys' and Girls' Club Leader and Miss Ruth Featherly, of the State College, spent November 4th and 5th, in Charlevoix county, visiting several schools, that were interested in carry on club work this winter.

For the girls, sewing clubs were discussed and outlined and for the boys, handicraft clubs. In all cases the boys and girls were very interested and desirous of organizing immediately to begin work.

The members of the sewing clubs will make several articles this winter such as sewing bags, kimonas, aprons, dresses, etc., while the boys make many useful articles, such as bench hooks, tie racks, milk stools, book racks, nail boxes, bird houses and numerous other articles.

Then early in the spring each school will hold a local Achievement Day at which time all the articles will be exhibited and judged and the local champion selected. Later a County Achievement Day will be held and county champion chosen, who will represent the county at the Gaylord Club Camp.

In the city schools sewing and manual training are usually included in the curriculum, but rural boys and girls do not have this privilege, hence we believe in club work, which tends to overcome this handicap.

The following schools were visited and it is hoped that 75 boys and girls will make up the membership.

Miss Lottie Webster, Hilton school, Charlevoix.

Mr. Duffey, Phelps school, Phelps.

Miss Irene Bruce, Burgess school, Charlevoix.

Miss Helen Germond, Buy Shore school, Bay Shore.

Mr. W. C. Palmer, Clerion school, Clarion.

Miss Vera Belding, Peninsula, East Jordan.

Miss Cora Willis, Chandler, Boyne Falls.

Miss Francis Gould, Star school, East Jordan.

Miss Marguerite Schepers, Wildwood, Boyne City.

RED CROSS SERVICES SHOW UPWARD TREND

Disaster Relief, Veterans' Aid Foremost in Fiscal Year. Services All Vital.

Expenditures by the American Red Cross for the last year showed a mounting curve as compared with those for the preceding year—$11,892,869.35 as against $10,321,679.80. The outstanding appropriations were for disaster relief and assistance to disabled veterans. For disaster relief the American Red Cross expended $3,871,827, of which the National Organization contributed $3,642,827, and the Red Cross Chapters $229,000. For disabled veterans, a total of $3,628,178 was called for, of which National Headquerters appropriated $1,641,178, and Chapters, $1,987,000.

The disaster relief figures do not include the Florida operations, which occurred after the end of the fiscal year, in addition to the work for disabled veterans, the Red Cross continued its work on behalf of men in the Regular Army and Navy and Merine Corps, which called for a total appropriation of $509,451.

The enrolled nurses' reserve, from which nurses for disasters and other emergencies are called, cost $47,382. horne entirely by the National Headquerters. Public Health Nursing, a part of the Red Cross program of national health work, cost $866,823; instruction in home hygiene and care of the sick required $152,466 in nutrition instruction, $164,107 was expended.

The Red Cross campaign to reduce deaths from accidents and drowning, conducted by the First Aid and Life-Saving Service, called for $352,385, and has shown tangible results in lives saved annually.

The Junior Red Cross, one of the foremost peace influences in the world, was carried on at a cost of $531,053. All local Chapter activities of the Red Cross cost $823,000, while other domestic operations of the Red Cross, borne by National Headquarters, amounted to $261,040.

The remainder of the fiscal year's expenditures were accounted for in insular and foreign operations, of which foreign disasters in which the American Red Cross served, absorbed $53,075; League of Red Cross Societies, $180,000; Junior Red Cross foreign projects, $74,065; assistance to insular Chapters, $49,599; other insular and foreign work, $54,763; supervision of service activities and general management, $270,629.27.

The total expenditures for the year ended June 30 last were divided: National Organization, $7,381,869.35; local Chapters, $4,511,000. In the Tenth Annual Roll Call, November 11 to 25, the public is invited to share in this vast work done in their name by enrolling in the American Red Cross as members.

Trees Need Mates

Some apple trees refuse to bear when planted alone. Dr. A. R. Stout, New York botanical garden, says that the McIntosh, Rhode Island Greening, Delicious, Gravenstein, Red Gravenstein and Cortland are decidedly self-fruitless; that is, they will set but little fruit to their own pollen. It has also been discovered that certain varieties are not satisfactory cross-pollenizers for other varieties. For example, McIntosh pollen has been found to be highly fertile on Cortland.

LEGAL NOTICES

MORTGAGE SALE

Default having been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage made by Andrew Bert Williams and Josephine Williams, his wife, both of Doyle township, Schoolcraft county, Michigan, to James C. Wood, of the City of Manistique, Schoolcraft county, Michigan, dated October 5th, 1922, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for the county of Charlevoix, state of Michigan, on the 9th day of October, A. D. 1922, in Liber 23 of mortgages on page 486, whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative, on which said mortgage there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice for principal and interest and taxes paid by the mortgagee to protect his security, the sum of Three Hundred Three Dollars and twenty-eight cents ($303.28) and an attorney fee of twenty-five dollars as provided for in said mortgage and no suit or proceedings at law having been instituted to recover the moneys secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and the statute in such case made and provided, the undersigned will, on Saturday the 4th day of December, A. D. 1926, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the front door of the Court House in the city of Charlevoix in the county of Charlevoix, state of Michigan, that being the place where the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix is held, sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, the premises described in said mortgage, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount as due as aforesaid on said mortgage with seven per cent interest and all legal costs, together with said attorney fee, the premises being described in said mortgage as follows, to-wit:

The southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section thirty-five (35) and the south one-half of the southwest quarter of section thirty-six (36), all in town forty (40) north, of range ten (10) west, Charlevoix county, Michigan.

Dated September 8, 1926.

mild flirtation with Olga that he had dropped when school closed and Olga met him more than half way.

"Wouldn't that come and get you!" growled Kent to Lydia as Cimelle and Olga paddled away in the canoe, the next morning. "Say, Lyd, let's kill time with a tramp up to the settlement for some gum."

"All right. I can stand it if you can. Will you come along, Miss Towne?"

Miss Towne, who had been highly edified by the morning's maneuvering shook her head and settled herself in her hammock. "No eight-mile walk for me. I'm taking a rest cure."

CHAPTER X

The Camp

Lydia and Kent did not use the roads. It was with the old familiar sense of make-believe adventure that they started on what they called a beeline southwest. And it was mid afternoon before, hungry and tired weary, they reached the store that backed up against the Indian school. They bought sardines, crackers and cheese and ate them perched on a dry goods box near the hitching rack.

"There! I feel happier," said Kent as he threw away the empty sardine cans. "How are you, old lady?"

Lydia swung her feet contentedly. "Fine! Let's start back. We'll be there by supper time. I'm sure we know the way now."

But alas for the vanity of amateur woodcraftsmen! The late June dusk found them still threading the endless aisles of pine, their sense of direction completely obscured by the sinking of the sun.

"Scared, Lyd?" inquired Kent as they paused for a moment's rest on a log.

"No, but I'm awful hungry." Lydia drew a trifle closer on the log to Kent. "Supposing we have to stay out here all night!" She shivered a little.

"Well, I'd build a fire," said Kent in a matter-of-fact manner that Lydia suspected was assumed, "and fix you up on a bed of pine needles. Then I'd stand guard all night, like a little tin hero. I hope the folks won't worry about us. In the meantime, you and I can have a good old talk, like the old days. Remember?"

"I remember! Kent, are you afraid?"

"I should say not! I like the woods at night. Don't the fern and the needles smell fine? Lyd, what're you going to do after you finish high school?"

"Go on to the university. Aren't you?"

"Dad wants me to, but I guess I'll go to work. Why waste four years learning a lot of stuff that'll never earn me a cent? What do you want to go to the university for?"

"Kent, I promised mother I'd go. And I want to anyhow. We're so poor, that I'll never be anything but a scrub woman if I don't get educated."

Kent stirred uncomfortably. "I want to make money, quick."

"I don't see what the hurry is. Is it Olga?"

"Of course it isn't Olga! She's all right to flirt with and a pearly looker, but you don't suppose a fellow wants to marry every girl he gets crazy about?"

"I didn't know," said Lydia, meekly. "Nobody was ever crazy about me."

"You aren't that kind, thank heaven. You're growing up the way a girl ought to. I know all about it."

"You're Growing Up the Way a Girl Ought To."

Lydia sat staring into the darkness, thinking this over. She was getting an amount of comfort out of the conversation that made her realize how sore a spot there had been within her.

"Kent," asked Lydia, suddenly, "what's a hussy?"

"Huh!" exclaimed Kent. "What makes you ask that?"

"Election night there were lots of women, flashily dressed, around, and father said they were hussies. And I saw Gustus flirting with one of them, and some of the senior boys, too. And I saw some of the best dressed of the Indians with them."

"You'd better ask your father," said Kent.

"I did and he said I'd know when I got older."

There was silence again. Kent was only seventeen. He sat staring with puzzled eyes into the darkness. He tried to picture Olga putting a question like this to him, and failed. A sudden realization of the loneliness of Lydia's unmothered girlhood, of her innocent faith in him, touched the best that was in him. His voice was a little husky but he answered coolly.

"A hussy, Lyd, is a flirt who's gone to the bad. Those around Lake City chase after the students and the Indians who've got government allowances, and get their money away from them."

"Oh," said Lydia. "Oh!" Then thoughtfully, "Aren't men silly!"

"Yes, they are," agreed Kent. "And, Lyd, whenever you want to know about such things, you ask me. It's a man's place to tell a girl the things she ought to know."

"All right," replied Lydia, "and of course, you're just like a brother to me."

"Oh, I don't feel so brotherly as—Gee, there's a fire, Lydia!"

Faintly through the trees gleamed a distant blaze.

"It's the camp crowd, I guess," said Lydia.

"No, it isn't, it's a bunch of men," corrected Kent. "Hold on a minute, Lydia! Let's see what we're getting into."

He pulled her into the shelter of a giant pine trunk and the two peered at the group around the fire.

There were six half-breeds in "store" clothes and moccasins squatting around the blaze. None of them was speaking.

"They act as if they were waiting for some one," whispered Lydia.

"Gosh! There comes some one else. For the love of cats!"

John Levine emerged from the darkness of the forest into the fire glow.

"How'" he grunted, slipping into an empty space, opposite the two eavesdroppers.

"How," returned the Indians.

Silence in the woods, except for the crackling fire.

"Kent, let's go! I don't want to listen. I don't want to know."

Kent seized her arm. "You've got to stay. It's your business to know," he whispered sharply.

"Where's Eagle's Feather?" asked Levine.

"Sick," replied an Indian.

John nodded. "I got back from Washington today. Big fight there. Marshall and his crowd, they'll make a big fight. I may have to compromise. I may make my bill read, only mixed bloods can sell their lands, not full bloods."

"Good!" said an Indian. "Full blood don't want to sell, anyhow."

"Better for you mixed bloods," agreed Levine, "because you'll get higher prices for your land, but worse for us whites, for there'll be less land, unless—you mixed bloods should happen to swear the full bloods are mixed, too. It'll be a good way for all of you to pay up old debts."

Lydia's heart was pounding so hard that it really pained her. She stared at John unbelievably. Yet it was the same familiar, sallow face, with the gaunt look about the cheeks. Only the eyes were strange. Lydia had never seen them so hard, so searching before.

"Well," said Levine, "is that all you folks have got to report, after six months? What do you think I'm paying you for?"

What more might have come Lydia did not know for an old squaw came tottering into the fire glow. She was gray-headed and emaciated.

"Oh, that's our old squaw, Kent, remember?" whispered Lydia.

"Shut up!" murmured Kent.

The squaw made her way up to John. There was something sinister in the look of her and he rose.

"What you do now, white man?" she snarled. "Steal! Steal more, eh?"

Levine looked down on her, and his voice was pitying. "Why, you poor old devil, you look half-starved." He dug into his pocket and brought out a silver dollar. "Go get some grub," he said.

The old woman stared from the dollar to Levine's face and her voice rose to a shriek.

"Steal! Steal! Make our young men drunk! Make our young girls have babies that grow like these snakes," she pointed a trembling, scrawny finger at the scowling mixed bloods. "White man—dirty—fool—dirty thief," and she spat at Levine, at the same time striking the dollar from his hand. It rolled out onto the needles and lay shining in the firelight.

John stiffened and the mixed bloods watched him curiously. But the squaw suddenly burst into the feeble yet deep drawn sobs of the old, and tottering over to the silver she picked it up. "Hungry!" she sobbed. "All the time touch hungry." And she started slowly away from the fire in the direction of Kent and Lydia's hiding place.

"Quick!" whispered Kent, and noiselessly the two ran back into the darkness of the woods, through which, however, a silver light was beginning to filter. "There's the moon," he said in a low voice. "Now I can find the lake."

In less than half a mile they found the lake and far around its curving shore, the gleam of their own camp fire.

"Holy Mike! What do you think of that?" demanded Kent as they headed for the fire. "Isn't Levine a wonder!"

Lydia scarcely heard him. "John Levine!" she murmured. "My best friend! Oh, I can't believe it."

They were nearing the camp now and Kent stopped and in the moonlight took Lydia by the shoulders. "Look here, Lyd, don't you tell a soul about what we saw. Promise me!"

"I'll do nothing of the kind," snapped Lydia.

"Promise!" repeated Kent.

"I will not!" returned Lydia.

Kent's hold on her shoulders tightened. He wanted to box her ears and yet, as he gazed at the wistful, sensitive lips, he felt a sudden desire to kiss her.

"Well, promise me, you'll say nothing while we're in camp, anyhow."

Lydia hesitated. After all, she thought, to whom could she tell the story and what could any one do! "All right, I'll promise that," she agreed, slowly.

It was scarcely nine o'clock, after all, when they trudged into the camp. Charlie and Gustus came in a moment later, having heard Miss Towne's call.

"Oh, Lydia! Lydia! I've worried myself sick." And the cruel Miss Towne, the grouchy Miss Towne, threw her arms about Lydia, with a little murmur that was curiously like a sob.

"We were just going to the settlement for help," said Charlie, "though we were pretty sure nothing serious could have happened."

"We saved your supper," said Margery. "Come on, Gustus, we'll heat it for 'em."

Lydia was tired the next day and elected to stay in camp with Miss Towne while the others went on an all-day strawberry hunt.

Lydia was lying in a hammock with a book, when a horse's hoof beats sounded under the trees and Levine rode into the camp.

TRI-COUNTY REAL ESTATE MEETING

Col. John G. Emery Spoke Before Board Tuesday Evening

The Tri-County Real Estate Board held their regular November session at the Charlevoix Hotel on Tuesday evening, November 9.

Quite a number of dealers from neighboring cities were present, but attendance was considerably curtailed by the fierce snow storm. Col. John G. Emery of Grand Rapids, was the speaker of the evening, dwelling at length on the new movement of the Western Michigan Publicity Association, organized in 12 counties of western Michigan for the purpose of aiding development of resort and agricultural properties.

INSTALL A MODERN BURGLARY ALARM

East Jordan State Bank Protects its Holdings

There is no matter that is given greater publicity, and which concerns the public more than the success of bank burglars. The Bankers Assns. at the present time are greatly aroused over this situation. The burglary losses are continually on the increase, and it appears that in the near future the burglary insurance companies will be compelled to increase the insurance rates accordingly.

The officers and directors of the State Bank of East Jordan, believing that their bank should be immune from a successful burglary attack, have installed the most modern form of burglary protection. The system consists of a mechanical and chemical resistaince which will combat the burglars with their acetylene toreh or any other method of burglarious attack. The protection is approved and recommended by the highest crime commissioners of the country.

Citizens of this community will greatly appreciate the interest that this bank has shown in providing protection for their customer's property. The system was installed by the Anakin Lock and Alarm Company of Chicago, Ill., who have already prevented 110 bank burglaries.—East Jordan Herald.

CHARLEVOIX GIRL MARRIED IN DETROIT

Miss Norma Sherman Bride of Joseph W. Riley

Word comes from Detroit of the marriage of Miss Norma Sherman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. Sherman of Eveline township, to Mr. Joseph W. Riley of that city, on Saturday, October 30. The young couple will make their home in Detroit.

The bride is well known in Charlevoix, and has a host of friends who extend their best wishes and congratulations. Mrs. Riley attended the Charlevoix Public Schools until ill health foreed her to take an extended vaeation. Later she went to Detroit and took a course in nursing, graduating with high honors three years later.

"Win-My-Chum" — Campaign of of Epworth League begins Sunday evening at 6:00. Each week evening but Saturday there will be a service. On Thursday evening, a pot-luck supper at six o'clock, at which Rev. J. O. Randall, district superintendent will be the speaker. Each other week evening the service will begin at 7:15 and last one half hour only. Competent leaders from among the young people will have charge of the meetings. All services but the Thursday evening service will be held in the Epworth League room.

The First Quarterly Conference will be held in the church Thursday evening at 7:30. Important business will be transacted, and every official is expected.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

B. G. Mattson, D. D., Minister

At the morning service 10:30 the pastor will continue the line of thought indicnted in lnst Sunday's sermon on the Dynamie Conception of Life with the subjeet, "The Moral Motive Power of the Old Testament."

Sunday school meets at twelve.

Young People's meetings at 6:00.

This church will unite for the evening service at 7:00 o'clock with the other churches in an Armistice Day observance held at the Baptist church.

The midweek service is at 7:30 on Thursday. Special preparations are being made to hold an all parish potluck supper on Thursday, November 18, to which all our church attendants are invited without chnrge. This is the beginning of the program for the annual all parish canvass to secure subscriptions to cover the church budget for the coming year.

BAPTIST CHURCH

In spite of the weather large congregations greeted the pastor last Sunday. The close of the tourist season and the large number of resident, who have gone for the winter presents one of the most discouraging conditions for church activities we have ever seen. Only the loyalty and constancy of those who remain makes possible a successful winter program. The experience last Sunday was a great encouragement.

Next Sunday morning, the pastor will discuss "The Return of Our Lord" at 10:30, and the Bible school will study "The Reward for Fidelity" at noon.

An Armistice Day service will be held by a union congregation in the evening. A very interesting program will be presented. If one is interested in the current issues of the world, they will enjoy and profit by this service.

Mid-week service on Thursday evening at 7:00. A cordial invitation to all services of the church.

CHARLEVOIX GIRL ENTERTAINS RADIO FANS

"Irish Nightingale" Guest of Buffalo Advertising Club

Ad-Vents, a weekly bulletin published by the Greater Buffalo Advertising Club, in its issue of November 9, is quite complimentary in its remarks about one of our former Charlevoix girls, Mrs. Bertram Edwards, well known to all of us as Miss Irene Finucan. The article says:

"Through the courtesy of an old and loyal member, Louis Plogsted, we will be privileged to hear Mrs. Bertram Edwards, coloratura soprano, who was formerly Miss Irene Finucan of Charlevoix, "The Irish Nightingale." This artist becamo very popular with the radio world, singing over WJQ at Rainbow Gardens and WEBH, Edgewater Beach Motel, both in Chicago. Mr. Plogsted, pianist of unusual ability, will play her accompaniments.

Charlevoix radio fans on numerous occasions have enjoyed hearing Mrs. Edwards when she sang at both of the above mentioned stations. Her voice brought back to all the enjoyment of hearing her sing at local entertainments.

EAST JORDAN HIGH SUSPENDED

SCHOOL BREAKS CONTRACT WITH CHEBOYGAN

State Department Takes Action on Complaint of Northerners—Cheboygan Gets Title

The Michigan Intercholastic Athletic association, which controls high school athletics in the state, has suspended the East Jordan high school, indefinitely, for alleged breaking of her football contract with Cheboygan, some weeks ago says the Petoskey Evening News. The matter of the broken contract was taken up at a recent meeting of the board of control and the action referred to above taken at that time. This information has just reached Petoskey through an official communication to the school from the office of the state athletic director at Lansing.

While it had been known for some time that East Jordan had broken her two-year contract with Cheboygan high school, it was not known that definite action on the alleged violation of the state rules had been considered, officially, by the state governing body. The action bars East Jordan high school from taking part in any athletic contests with other high schools of the state.

It is alleged that early last winter East Jordan sought to cancel her two-year football contract with Cheboygan, which called for a game at East Jordan in mid-October of this year. Later, it is alleged the heads of the two high schools reached an agreement that the contract should stand and that the game would be played. In the meantime the athletic department head at East Jordan had arranged a substitute game with some other school, according to the story, and was surprised to learn during the week of October 15, that the Cheboygan game was still on the schedule.

The suspension eliminates East Jordan from a tie with Cheboygan for the Northern Michigan Class C high school football honor. Neither school was defeated this season by another class C school. Cheboygan lost to Alpena in Class B, and East Jordan lost to Petoskey in the same class.

W. C. T. U. MEETS WITH MRS. SHORES

LARGELY ATTENDED BY MEMBERS AND VISITORS

Mrs. Jobo Joliffea in Charge of Davotiooals—Leading Topics Were Discussed

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union meeting last Friday at Mrs. Shores' was largely attended by women interested in prohibition and other righteous causes.

Mrs. John Joliffee had charge of the devotions and Mrs. B. G. Mattson presented the topic of "International Friendliness," making it clear that peace among the nations will result only from effort.

There are at the present time fifty or more international organizations functioning and making for friendliness between the citizens of the nations of the earth, exclusive of political leagues and conferences.

The bringing together of groups of young people of all nationalities through the Y. M. C. A. and other agencies to discuss matters of common interest is a hopeful sign of the times.

The Japanese doll project was mentioned as another venture in friendliness. At the time of the Doll Festival in Japan next March, thousands of dolls will be presented to the Japaneso children by the children of America with messages of good will and friendship.

Tea was served by the social committee, and the Union adjourned to meet in December with Mrs. Usher.

According to the headlines in some of the big dailies, Norwny has voted to end prohibition. But Norway never had prohibition in the sense that we understand it, but she did have a regulatory law limiting the alcoholic content to 14 per cent. This was raised to 2½ per cent three years ago and now must come off altogether. Norway has found by experience that compromise with booze doesn't work, and if this lesson means anything to us, it means that a country has got to be either wet or dry. Surely America is not yet ready to surrender to a debased appetite; to a craving for something that has never been anything but a curse to mankind.

Michigan's new governor was elected on a platform and the people know just how he stands on most of the questions which concern us as citizens of the state.

At the National W. C. T. U. convention held in Los Angeles recently there was a registration of 2595 and 600 of these were voting delegates. The women are determined to "hold fast and go forward" in spite of the constant attempt to undermine and discredit the Prohibition Law.

An increase of 53,500 new members was reported for the year, and a plan of work was adopted which includes a membership drive and an educational campaign.

Members are urged to study to know the law as to what it permitted and prohibited; the courts as to whether law violators are promptly tried and sentanced adequately; the facts about the benefits of prohibition and publish them.

At the recent state convention, Mrs. Elizabeth Perkins was elected president to succeed Mrs. Calkins, who retires to take up other work.

EARLY HISTORY OF CHARLEVOIX

FACTS FORGOTTEN EVEN BY PIONEERS SETTLERS

History Class of C. H. S. Prepare Very Creditable Account of Charlevoix—Read It

This graphic account of the history of the site of Charlevoix from the time of the Indians to the present, was prepared by the history class of the Charlevox high school under the able direction of Miss Velera Keller, teacher. It is replete with names dates and incidents, gathered here and there, and put into compact form. We are glad for the opportunity to publish it. Those new to Charlevoix and its environs will be interested, while to the older settlers it will serve to refresh memories that, once started, will bring forth many incidents now forgotten. It is mighty good reading. Clip it for future reference or send it to a friend you know will be interested. It will be published in two installments. The first one follows:

The earliest history of Charlevoix centers about the present site of the village of Charlevoix, known in the early days as Pine River and thus remained until 1860.

In many ways Charlevoix may be called "Historic Charlevoix," because of its many stirring adventures that deal with its gradual progress. Not the city alone, but the great man it is named for, has played his part heroically in the building up of our great nation.

Pere Jacques Charlevoix, a French missionary and traveler best known as the "Historian of New France," was born in Saint Quentin in 1682. Charlevoix became a Jesuit in 1698, when he was sixteen years old and from 1705 to 1709 taught school at Quebec, Canada. From here he returned to France, but in 1720 he was sent by the Duke of Orleans to gather information concerning the Western Sea, or the Pacific Ocean. He had heard that the Pacific could be reached by way of the Mississippi River, but evidently did not attempt this route. He sailed down the Mississippi to its mouth, but was shipwrecked in the Gulf and returned to France. Again, he was sent on various missions to the New World. Arriving in Quebec, Pere Charlevoix ascended the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes as far as Michilimackinac, established missions on the Great Lakes and was one of the first white men to reach Charlevoix, which was later named for him. A man—whose sidelights are reflected from his life are neither dim nor flickering, but reveal to us plainly a character of marked strength and will, riches, ambition and fame, all were renounced for the duty of service. He was the servant of the king of kings, entrusted with the most important of all the missions of advancement of the kingdom of Heaven upon earth. No more honorable title could be given a city than Charlevoix.

The very earliest inhabitants that lived in Charlevoix, were undoubtedly the Indians, according to the relics found. At Charlevoix the soil for a foot or more in depth on the top of the bluff of the north river, contains a great number of flint chips, together with some unfinished arrow heads that were spoiled in the making and thrown away. Many years ago, in evacuating a cellar, an ancient grave was opened in which were found a number of copper beads. In this same locality, on the steep banks of "Old River," were found pieces of copper which resulted in the finding of old Indian knives and bodkins.

The narration of events given and handed down by the earliest pioneers shows that the site of Charlevoix Village is historic ground, dealing both in Indian legends and traces left by the Mound Builders.

At Pine River, or often called "Green River," because of the green appearance of the water at times, the only inhabitants of fishermen and Mormons met with serious repulses. Pine River seemed to be a serious, but favorito resort for the fishermen and a community of such were collected there.

Capt. T. D. Smith had early established a small settlement in the bay, southwest of the mouth of the river, between it and Pine River Point. Four more families were also established here, west of Smith between him and the point, three families at the mouth of the river and one, half a mile farther north. Besides these Gentile families, there were two other families who had formerly been Mormons, but had renounced Mormonism and escaped from the settle-

BIG GAME ON THANKSGIVING DAY

C. H. S. TEAM WILL PLAY THE INDEPENDENTS

Game Called at 2:30 and a Big Crowd Is Expected—The Line-Up as Now Planned

The Charlevoix High School football team and the City Independent team will meet on Thanksgiving Day to see just who is going to be the rulers in football for the season 1926.

The high school team, although failing to win a game this season, has played good football, and in comparing the two teams it will be one of the hardest fought games played here this season.

The high school team will lose but few regulars this year by graduation, and a winning team is expected next season. The city outfit which is managed by Harold Jones, is composed of all the former school stars. Among the outfit Floyd Brown is expected to be the big noise. Brown has played tackle and starred with the strong Ferris Institute outfit. The Burns brothers, Pete and Bob, are both playing with Olivet College. Pete was captain of the high school team in 1925.

The game will be called at 2:30 and Allan Campbell and George Beeman will be the probable officials. The proceeds will go to the High School Athletic association to help pay some of the bills of this year's football.

This will give Charlevoix people an opportunity to celebrate Thanksgiving in the traditional way—eating a big dinner then the battle. The city band has also promised to be out and give us the "collegiate air." Let's go.

Following is the line-up:

Farmer	R.E.	Davenport
Kling	L.T.	Duffy
Brown	R.G.	Myers
Gill	C.	Nordrum
Blaha	R.G.	Kowalski
Williams	R.T.	Byers
Helms	R.E.	Woods
McCann	Q.B.	Hallett
Smith	H.B.	Coleman
Cooper	H.B.	Sharrow
Higman	F.B.	Hammett

Substitutes for the Indopendents: Morse, Bacot, Jones, Brown, R. Burns, L. Burns.

Substitutes for High School: Swanson, Atcheson, Crandall, Swartout, Parmeleo.

Former Resident Visits City

Mrs. Edw. Labadie and son, Edward, of Oakland, California, were registered at the Hotel Charlevoix, Wednesday. Mrs. Labadie was a Petoskey resident many years ago, her father owning the old Exchange Hotel in that city. She was interested in the growth of Northern Michigan since she last visited here, remarking how few old landmarks were left. Mrs. Labadie had several girlhood friends in Charlevoix, but found it impossible to trace any of them.

The Sophomore Class will hold a baked goods and candy sale, Saturday morning, November 20, at 9:00 o'clock, in Bronersky's Shoe Shop.—

ANNUAL RED CROSS ROLL CALL

TO BE HELD IN CHARLEVOIX NOVEMBER 19-20

County Officials Urge People to Respond to Call and Assist in the Work

The annual Red Cross Roll Call is to be held in this city November 19th and 20th. The local organization will be ready on these dates to receive membership at the Charlevoix County Bank and the State Savings Bank. Everyone is urged to join the American National Red Cross.

In its program it is local, it is national, it is international. In the fiscal year just ended, the chapters spent $4,497,000 for their local work. The National organization spent $7,379,000 in its national and international work. It is certain that the national and international work could not be performed as effectively without a very large and democratic membership, in order that it can continue to represent truly all the people.

The president of the United States expressed in unmistakable terms tha value of this large membership when he said: "It is characteristic of the American people that they have chosen as their instrument for the alleviation of suffering an institution as democratic as the government and the people which it serves. The American Red Cross in its service program knows neither race, nor creed, nor color. It draws its support from no single class, but from all our people. We have tested tha Red Cross in war and in peace. It has never failed us. It never will so long as it holds your generous support."

The annual roll call has a threefold objective: 1. securing the money to carry on the local work in each chapter and branch; 2. securing the money to carry on the national and international work; 3. securing tha large and democratic membership which will enable the organization to continue its work as the true representative of all the people.

The principal support for these services, national and local, comes from the membership dues. There are six Red Cross memberships, all renewable annually except the two last named in the list below. They vary in amount of dues, but a dollar member is precisely as much a member as the person who pays more than a dollar. The memberships are:

Annual membership, $1.00 (50c for local work; 50c for national and international work.)

Contributing membership, $5.00. ($4.50 for local work, 50c for national and international work.)

Sustaining membership, $10.00 ($9.50 for local work; 50c for national and international work.)

Supporting membership, $25.00. ($24.50 for local work; 50c for national and international work.)

Life membership, $50.00.

Patron membership, $100.00. (Life and patron membership fees go to the National Endowment Fund of which the interest only is used.)

In the Charlevoix County Chapter, Mrs. J. M. Harris of Boyne City is chairman; Mrs. A. E. Ruegseggor, Boyne City, secretary, and Mrs. A. F. Bridge, Charlevoix, is the treasurer. These officers urge the response to this call to assist in national work and to enable them to meet any local demands.

What would the Red Cross do if a disaster hit this town? Tha entire resources of the American National Red Cross would be used if needed to provide food, shelter, clothing and medical supplies in the hours right after the disaster, and the Red Cross would offer its services in directing the work and administering funds to assist the sufferers according to their needs. All money contributed for relief would be expended for relief. Your membership fee helps maintain this disaster relief service.

Farewell Entertainment

Mrs. Lawrence Chase and Mrs. James Gaskin, Sr., entertained at the Chase home at 204 Lewis street Monday evening in honor of Mrs. Archie Russell. The occasion was a farewell shower for Mrs. Russell who is leaving Charlavoix. The evening was spent at bridge.

Sunday school Sunday morning 11:45. Service at 10:30 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Services every evening at 7:30 p. m.

J. C. and Edith Millspaugh, the evangelists, are here. The messages have been timely and of interest to those who have heard them. Did you ever hear a cannon boom? Well, we haven't heard very many cannon booming yet, but expect to hear and see some of the results which may follow the explosion.

The messages which come to the front do not come over the radio, telephone or telegraph keys, but directly from the throne of God. Through His word and the Holy Spirit. They haven't got down to real business yet, but will. Have you seen the charts yet? They are a real inspiration to look at them—to see the various figures represented. Come and see for yourself.

Sunday morning the subject being "Confidence," confidence in ourselves, in God, and in our fellowmen being the main outlines. Sunday evening the subject being "Hope." An illustration being used on the blackboard to illustrate our real hope of Heaven. We expect to do more illustrating. The subject Monday night was "Preach the Word." The opened Bible illustrated before us.

You will miss it if you do not attend every one of these evening services. These evangelists are good speakers. Besides they tell us in their discourses of various experiences which they have had while in active service for the Master, Lord of Heaven and earth.

If it rains, come just the same. When it rains generally the subject or topic presented is of a real interesting nature. You cannot expect to get good things of valuable texture unless you work for them. They will not come to you. Just put forth an effort and they will show themselves. When Gabriel blows his horn then we will all have to appear. Get ready for the day and you'll not have to worry. We invite all of our citizens, friends and neighbors to come to hear these good discourses. Come!

Colleen Moore Is Booked Here Soon

Ultra modernism as practiced in London society—quite the last word on the subject—is revealed in all its wildness in "We Moderns," the new First National offering to open at the Palace Theatre next Wednesday and Thursday, Nov. 24 and 25.

The new play of hectic high life among Britain's post-war youth brings back to the screen Colleen Moore in the type of characterization for which she is best known. For the space of two productions Miss Moore appeared in most artistically sedate roles which demonstrated her great versatility. But her admirers continued to demand jazz—so in the coming production it's a plain case of "on with the dance.".

Hoot Gibson, a former Albertan cow-puncher, returned to the scene of his first triumphs at horsemanship to photograph his greatest effort as a motion picture actor.

Before he leaped to fame by winning the Pendleton championship in 1912, Gibson was a cowboy in Oregon and Alberta, traveling from ranch to ranch, as jobs were scarce and usually obtainable only at branding or roundup time.

But in 1912 Gibson contested for all the prizes and won so many of them that he also was awarded the all-around championship. One of the events in which he has taken first prize for many years is the Roman riding race in which the racer rides three horses, standing on their backs.

The picture was entirely photographed in Canada, the ranches used being those of H. R. H., the Prince of Wales, and Guy Weadick. Other exteriors were also shot in famous Wninwright park, a government reservation where there are thousands of buffalo in the game preserve. These animals were used in the buffalo stampere scenes.

KILLS WIFE THEN ENDS OWN LIFE

Gaylord Shocked By Brutal Murder and Suicide

Gaylord is horrified by a tragedy which took place there on Wednesday evening of last week, when Ed. Sloat, about 40 years of age, shot and killed his wife and then put a rifle ball through his own body.

Mr. and Mrs. Sloat had been having trouble for a year or more and he repeatedly threatened to shoot her. The evening of the tragedy Sloat was seen coming towards the house armed with a rifle. Mrs. Olds, mother of Mrs. Sloat, grabbed the two little girls and rushed out doors with them. He shot his wife as she was trying to leave the house and then went into the woodshed and ended his own life.

There were three children in the family. Sloat was a carpenter by trade and moved to Gaylord from Alba three years ago.

He told the officers, who arrived before he died, that the shooting was just an accident.

LYDIA of the Pines

by HONORÉ WILLSIE

W.N.U. SERVICE COPYRIGHT by FREDERICK A. STOKES CO.

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

Lydia had been wondering now, when she saw him in town, she was going to meet him, what she was going to say to him. But now, her only thought was that here was the devoted friend who had understood her since babyhood.

As he dismounted, she jumped to her feet. "Oh, toy dear Mr. Levine! My dear! My dear!" she cried and her hair flying, she ran to him and threw her arms about his neck.

John threw a long arm about her, and held her to him closely, while with his free hand he smoothed back the glory of her hair. And Miss Towne, watching, saw his long saturnine face transformed.

"Why, Lydia, my little sweetheart! I didn't realize you'd missed me so." Then, catching Miss Towne's gaze, he smiled.

"Lydia has few loves, but they're strong," he said. "I'm her foster father. My name's John Levine."

Lydia disengaged herself. "And this is Miss Towne," she said, "my dearest teacher."

"Sit down," said the chaperone, "while Lydia and I finish dressing."

"You'll have lunch with us?" called Lydia as she retreated toward the tent.

"Yes, but I can't stay longer. Must be back in Lake City for supper," replied Levine, tying up his horse.

Lydia was delighted to put her hand to cooking again, and while Miss Towne set the table, John chatted with both of them of his Washington experiences. He rode away immediately after he had finished eating. Miss Towne wiped the dishes thoughtfully.

"It's hard to realize that he's the scandalous John Levine," she said. "He's simply charming!"

Lydia flared, flushed and subsided. Never again, she realized, could she contradict aspersions cast on Levine's character. And yet, how like a bad dream the episode of last night seemed. If only it had been a dream!

CHAPTER XI

Lydia Giggles

The days flew lightly by, lightly for Lydia, too, in spite of the heavy secret she carried of Levine's plotting.

The day before they broke camp, Lydia's old squaw appeared and asked for Charlie Jackson.

Charlie and Kent were cooking dinner.

"Dear me," said Miss Towne, "tell him to take the poor thing away, Lydia."

"He must feed her, first," exclaimed Lydia, leading the old Indian over to the cooking shelter.

Kent and Lydia exchanged glances as Charlie led the squaw—Susie, he called her—into the woods, after Lydia had heaped her old arms with food. Kent and Gustus had put the dinner on the table and they all were seated at the meal when Charlie returned.

"What did she want, Charlie?" asked Olga.

"You wouldn't care if I told you," replied Charlie, grimly. "But," he burst forth suddenly, "some day you whites will pay. Some day the Japs or the Jews will do to you Americans what you've done to us.

"Look here, Lydia, Levine is up to some new cussedness. Old Susie came on him in council the other night with six of the worst half-breeds in the reservation. She lost her head and began to jaw him so she didn't find out what it was about. And he's getting the last of my timber now. Lydia, you've got to help me. When you get home, talk to Levine."

"Getting the last of your timber!" exclaimed Kent.

"Yes, the law lets 'em get the 'dead and down' stuff and who's going to swear it's fresh stuff that he cut this summer and will get out next winter?"

"But how does he come to be taking your wood? Why don't you go to see him yourself?" asked Kent.

"I can't answer either of those questions," replied Charlie, sullenly.

The two young whites thought of the attack on Levine, and looked at each other apprehensively.

"Won't the Indian agent stop him?" asked Lydia.

"He! Why, he's deep in the mire himself with Dave Marshall. My God, Margery Marshall went to New York on a blind Indian boy's pines! Lydia, save my pines for me! They belong to my tribe. My father was going to Washington three years ago to tell the President about the graft when they shot him from ambush. If I put up a fight, they'll shoot me. Lydia, won't you help us?"

Neither Kent nor Lydia ever had seen Charlie thus before. He was neither arrogant nor sullen. He was pleading with a tragic hopelessness that moved his two hearers profoundly.

"Oh, Charlie! I will try," cried Lydia. "I truly will."

"I knew you would," said Charlie, huskily, and he turned back abruptly to the camp.

Lydia stared about her. Supposing, she thought, that she owned a hundred acres of this pine land. She forgot Kent and concentrated every force of her mind on sensing what land ownership would mean. And suddenly there stirred within her a desire for acreage, for trees, soil, stream and shrub, a wide demesne that should be hers and her children's forever.

"Are you really going to talk to Levine?" Kent roused her from her reverie.

"Yes! Didn't I promise to?"

"Lots of good it'll do," grunted Kent. "And if you tell him we overheard him in the woods, I'll be sore."

"I don't see why."

"Because, after I finish high school, I'm going to tell him I know, to make him let me in on the deal. Look here, Lyd, don't tell him I was with you, anyhow."

"Oh, all right," replied Lydia, crossly. "For goodness' sake, don't let's talk about it any more. I don't see why men always have to be plotting! I'm going back to camp and help pack."

The driver arrived with the carryall at nine o'clock the next morning, and at mid-afternoon, Lydia was dropped at the gate, where Adam took possession of her.

The house seemed small and dingy. Lydia dropped her suitcase in the kitchen.

"I've just got to train old Lizzie," she said, "so that she won't leave her old carpet slippers and her apron in the middle of the kitchen every time she goes out. I do wish we had Mission furniture instead of this everlasting old mahogany. I just guess there's got to be some reforming in this house, this summer."

Amos came in the gate shortly after six. Lydia was waiting for him at the front door. He looked suddenly kissed him very tenderly. It required all the supper hour and all the remainder of the evening to tell the story of the camp and to answer Lizzie's and Amos' questions. There were several episodes Lydia did not describe; that of the half-breed council in the wood, for example.

Lydia was sitting on the front steps, the next afternoon, with a book in her lap and Adam at her feet, when Billy Norton called. He stopped for a chat in the garden with her father, before coming up to greet Lydia.

"He is awful homely? A regular old farmer," she thought, comparing him with the elegant Gustus and with Kent's careless grace.

"Hello, Lyd! Awful glad you're back!"

He sat down on the step below her and Lydia wrinkled her nose. He carried with him the odor of hay and horses.

"How's your mother?" asked Lydia. "I'm coming over, tomorrow."

"Mother's not so very well. She works too hard at the blamed canning. I told her I'd rather never eat it than have her get so done up."

"I'll be over to help her," said Lydia. "We had a perfectly heavenly time in camp, Billy."

"Did you?" asked her caller, indifferently. "Going to try to sell fudge, this winter, Lyd?"

"I don't know." Lydia's tone was mournful. "Daddy hates to have me. Now I'm growing up he seems to be getting sensitive about my earning money."

"He's right, too," said Billy, with a note in his voice that irritated Lydia.

"Much you know about it! You just try to make your clothes and buy your school books on nothing. Dad's just afraid people'll know how little he earns, that's all. Men are selfish pigs."

Astonished by this outburst, Billy turned round to look up at Lydia. She was wearing her Sunday dress of the year before, cheap cotton that she had outgrown. The young man at her feet did not see this. All he observed were the dusty gold of her curly head, the clear blue of her eyes and the fine set of her head on her thin little shoulders.

"You always look just right to me, Lyd," he said. "Listen, Lyd. I'm not going to be a farmer, I'm—"

"Not be a farmer!" cried Lydia. "After all you've said about it!"

"No! I'm going in for two years' law, then I'm going into politics. I tell you, Lydia, what this country needs today more than anything is young, clean politicians."

"You mean you're going to do like Mr. Levine?"

"God forbid!" exclaimed the young man. "I'm going to fight men like Levine. And by heck," he paused and looked at Lydia dreamily, "I'll be governor and maybe more, yet."

"But what's changed you?" persisted Lydia.

"The fight about the reservation, mostly. There's something wrong, you know, in a system of government that allows conditions like that. It's against American principles."

Lydia was impressed. She forgot that Billy smelled of the barnyard.

"Well," she said, "we'd all be proud of you if you were President, I can tell you."

"Would you be!" Billy's voice was pleased. "Then, Lydia, will you wait for me?"

"Wait for you?"

"Yes, till I make a name to bring to you."

Lydia flushed angrily. "Look here, Billy Norton, you don't have to be silly, after all the years we've known each other. I'm only fifteen, just remember that, and I don't propose to wait for any man. I'd as soon think of waiting for—for Adam, as for you, anyhow."

"Oh, All Right," Replied Lydia Crossly.

Billy rose with dignity, and without a word strode down the path to the gate and thence up the road. Lydia stared after him indignantly. "That old farmer!" she said to Adam, who wriggled and slobbered sympathetically.

She was still indignant when John Levine arrived and found her toasting herself and the waffles for supper, indiscriminately. Perhaps it was this sense of indignation that made her less patient than usual with what she was growing to consider the foibles of the male sex. At any rate, she precipitated her carefully planned conversation with Levine, when the four of them were seated on the back steps, after supper.

The others were listening to Lydia's account of her investigating tour with Charlie.

"I shouldn't say it was the best idea in the world for you to be wandering through the woods with that young Indian," was Levine's comment when Lydia had finished.

"I don't see how you can speak so," cried Lydia, passionately, "when this minute you're taking his pine wood."

"Lydia!" said Amos, sharply.

"Let her alone, Amos," Levine spoke quietly. "What are you talking about, Lydia?"

"The Indians are people, just like us," she cried, "and you're treating them as if they were beasts. You're robbing them and letting them starve! Oh, I saw them! Charlie showed the poor things to me—all sore eyes, and coughing and eating dirt. And you're making money out of them! Maybe the very money you paid our note with was made out of a starved squaw. Oh, I can't stand it to think it of you!"

Lydia paused with a half sob and for a moment only the gentle ripple of the waves on the shore and the crickets were to be heard. Levine, elbow on knee, chin on hand, looked

What Is a Diuretic?

People Are Learning the Value of Occasional Use.

EVERYONE knows that a laxative stimulates the bowels. A diuretic performs a similar function to the kidneys. Under the strain of our modern life, our organs are apt to become sluggish and require assistance. More and more people are learning to use Doan's Pills, occasionally, to insure good elimination which is so essential to good health. More than 50,000 grateful users have given Doan's signed recommendations. Scarcely a community but has its representation. Ask your neighbor!

Announcing

Two New DeLuxe Types

~~~ unparalleled in elegance and luxury

Continuing its many triumphs of 1926, Oakland announces two superbly smart body types—the DeLuxe Coupe and the DeLuxe Landau Sedan on the famous Pontiac Six Chassis.

These were developed to meet the insistent demand for an inexpensive six-cylinder car, combining unusual power, speed and stamina with a rare degree of distinctive beauty and elegance.

Fenders as well as body, hood, lamps and top in modish Peter Pan Blue Duco. Artillery wheels in natural wood—special luxurious mohair upholstery—body hardware of period design—garnish rails and steering wheels of rich American walnut—nickeled radiator—bumpers and rear vision mirror—such are the more important touches of distinction which lift the new Pontiac Sixes to the very forefront of the most fashionable creation of the day.

You will find these new Pontiac Six DeLuxe Types well worth a special visit to our showrooms. Prices only slightly higher than standard types—DeLuxe Coupe, $895; DeLuxe Landau Sedan, $975.

Pontiac Six, $825 to $975. Oakland Six, companion to Pontiac Six, $1025 to $1295. All prices at factory. Easy to pay on the liberal General Motors Time Payment Plan.

CHARLEVOIX-THE-BEAUTIFUL

A Booster Poem
By H. Kelsey Allen

I've travelled o'er this continent from east to western coast
I mention this to show the range, and not as idle boast.
From Mexico to Canada, I've seen the south and north,
Each section has its beauties, its scenery and worth.

Nebraska's plains, the mountain range in Colorado state,
The canyons and the geysers thrill, as does the Golden Gate;
Niagara Falls the sense appalls, but seems to break one's rest,
So in some way these autumn days, I like your land the best.

Your harbor, lakes and scenery is beauty unsurpassed,
So restful in their grandeur that the memory will last..
The people here are kind and strive to make the stranger know
That he is welcome in their midst, and so he dreads to go

Into another field to work, a place he knows not of,
But wishes he could stay awhile and share this brother love.
But there is something I would like to tell you while I'm here,
I do not wish to be unkind, please get my meaning clear.

The Lord has smiled upon your land, an Eden now it stands,
You'd know if you had travelled more in some unfavored lands.
I fear you don't appreciate the chance you have to grow,
You've done a lot, but not enough your gratitude to show.

I have a vision as I write, a city large and grand,
A Charlevoix that all the world's respect could soon command,
The thing that makes a city grow is BOOSTERS by the score,
Not just the merchants and the press, the people must do more.

Don't go to other towns to trade, don't knock your leading men,
They have to live and few get rich, so BOOST, I say again.
When you help others, you are sure to help yourself the most,
So give in kindly word and thought and BOOST instead of roast.

I thank you,
H. Kelsey Allen, Conducting Benj. Brown's Sale.

HELP OUR CRIPPLED CHILDREN

"Help us a dollar's worth."

This appeal comes from thirteen thousand crippled children in Michigan, pleading for normal bodies and health.

For more than five years, the Michigan Society for Crippled Children, with headquarters in Ann Arbor, has been attacking the problem. It has held clinics in several counties, conducted house to house surveys to locate children with bone deformities, attempted to educate the public in the understanding that most of the unfortunate children are crippled by causes that are preventable. It has now come to appreciate the problem as one that can best be handled locally, with such central support as will make individual effort most effective.

Thanksgiving week the society will appeal to the men and women of Michigan to enable it to start in an aggressive manner a movement that will place the state among the first in recognizing that the cripple needs help. Organization by counties has been started all over Michigan. Late this month, these groups will hold enrollment and every person in the state is invited to join his county society for crippled children. The membership fee is one dollar, one-half of which will be spent right at home. The remainder will be used to finance the cost of indispensable help from the central office.

Join the movement. Help a dollar's worth. Enroll the family. A crippled child can be restored completely to normal health and usefulness in a majority of cases if found and treated correctly before he grows too old. If neglected he becomes an unhappy charge upon others all his life.

Unite with your neighbors in this cause.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AGAIN

The capital punishment supporters insist that their method would at least halt and possibly stop the major crime of the country. States with the death penalty are getting no such benefits and it is refreshing to hear an Ann Arbor savant, Prof. Thomas H. Reed, of the political science department, declare, "Crime is a problem of judicial reform, not one of legislation." Our suggestion that all offenders be sentenced scientifically instead of under the present system of fixed expirations, is the best crime preventative we have heard. This is no egotistical blast but it is the only safe method. Why hazard the public with the annoyance and expense by releasing a criminal who is mentally unfit to be at large? Professor Reed explained that little could be done by legislation. There are a few minor changes in some states that might be made to remove some obstacle to the sure and swift administration of justice, but for the most part all changes must come from the courts and the bar. He added that punishment is not meant for vengeance, but is to impress on others who are tempted, that there is punishment. "It would do no good," he said, "to make the penalties of crime more severe. It is the certainty and swiftness of justice which counts." Comparing English with American procedure Professor Reed stated that English law is not much different from the American law but that their lawyers do not look for technicalities to escape and delay trial as they do here. The reason for that are that the barrister would lose the respect of his colleagues should he attempt the methods of American criminal lawyers who make such efforts to have their clients escape the law.

SOCIALISM AND COMMUNISM

There are many persons who feel that there is a great difference between Socialism and Communism. We find our parlor pinks flirting with Socialism and denouncing Communism. There are others who believe that Socialism is a scientific political proposal which has much of merit, but that Communism is rough stuff and should not be tolerated. Communism, of course, is simply Socialism in practice. The Communist is prepared to throw bricks in promoting his Socialistic ideas, while the Socialist per se., according to the pink person we have alluded to, theorizes and talks about it only But the Socialist who talks does so only until he gets into power and then he becomes just as aggressive for the maintenance of that power as the Communist. The Socialist is a Communist when he is sure of winning and the Communist is a Socialist at all times and willing to fight to win. The Socialist very often ingratiates himself with the unthinking Conservative and converts him. If he can do enough of this converting he will be in a position to be an active Socialist, or in other words he will be a Communist. It is too bad that the distinction between these two political breeds is so often overlooked, especially by our men and women who are chloroformed by an excess of money.

THE BANKERS SPEAK

The financial interests of this country maintain a careful watch of everything that enters into the industrial life of the nation. No other single group of business men are more qualified to speak on the industrial progress than the bankers as a whole. At their annual convention at Los Angeles a few weeks ago, they adopted the following resolution, which is well worthy of careful thought:

"Our railroads are now operating with a higher degree of economy and and eficiency than they have ever before attained. Our national prosperity is dependent upon them, and it is primarily because the railroads have continuously supplied prompt and efficient transportation of goods that this country has been enabled to enjoy a long period of industrial activity and sustained prosperity without any accumulation of excessive inventories which in former periods of general business activity have resulted in over-production and in credit stringencies."

If Groesbeck continues to bounce the fellows who supported Fred Green, and Green throws out the guys who supported Groesbeck, the janitor down at the Capitol won't have much trouble sweeping under the chairs the first of the year.

A. L. DUELL DEAD AT HARBOR SPRINGS

Emmet County Pioneer Booster Passes Suddenly Friday

Andrew L. Deuel, respected and substantial citizen of Harbor Springs, died at his home in that village Friday evening. He was 76 years of age. While in failing health, Mr. Deuel continued to be active until the very end, and was in Petoskey on a business trip a few days before his death.

Mr. Deuel began legal practice in Harbor Springs after his graduation from the U. of M. in 1880. His career was marked by worthy accomplishments on his part—both as a lawyer and a loyal and progressive citizen. He was the recipient of many political honors and a lifelong and energetic Republican.

He held the office of prosecuting attorney several terms, president of the Village of Harbor Springs six terms and for over 30 years was president of the school board. He served as postmaster under the administration of President Harrison and again under McKinley and Roosevelt. He also served two terms in the state legislature.

Funeral services were held from the Presbyterian church, Harbor Springs, Sunday. Burial under Masonic auspices.

PATHE NEWS FILMS FISHING INDUSTRY

Film to Be Shown With Other Current News Features

F. Felbringer, cameraman from the Chicago office of the Pathe News, returned to Chicago last week after filming the fishing industry centered in the Charlevoix branch of the U. S. Department of Fisheries. He filmed first, the taking of the trout, the unlouding of the fish at the docks, and the care of the nets; then the work at the hatchery where the spawn was brought and prepared for the hatching process.

The news reel will endeavor to show the importance of fish as a food as well as the manner in which it is harvested and propagated. It will also show the hazards the Great Lakes fishermen encounter in the rough seas and high winds while taking their catch.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH
B. G. Mattson, D. D., Minister

At the Sunday morning service the pastor will preach a sermon on "Christ's Law of Spiritual Economy." Sunday school at twelve o'clock.

A special Vesper Thanksgiving service will be held at 4:30 with musical program by vested choir and with a brief address by the pastor.

Young People's meeting at six.

This Thursday evening at 6:30 the church will hold a fellowship supper on the potluck plan to which all families and individuals interested in our church are invited. A parish letter has been widely circulated this week explaining the plan for the annual all parish canvass. This fellowship supper besides being an occasion of hearty social enjoyment will be the occasion for the launching of a new plan to increase the interest in the church and the success of its work.

CLOSING OUT SALE THE COMING EVENT

Brown's Sale of Emrey Stock Opens November 23

As a newspaper we are glad to call the attention of the public to any movement that makes for the progress of our city and that will benefit the masses, and it is a pleasure to give publicity to a business transaction recently made that should be the means of bringing a large number of people to our town from a radius of at least fifty miles around and just at a time of year when things are mighty quiet in a business way.

We refer to the big sale being staged by Benjamin Brown, who purchased the clothing stock of the Emrey Clothing House, formerly conducted by the late Sarah Emrey, who for more than forty years was known as Charlevoix's leading clothier.

To block the purchase of this stock by outside parties, Mr. Brown took over the deal and this should be appreciated by every merchant in town as we have bona fide information that these outside merchants were intending to bring in merchandise from out-of-town stores. Mr. Brown has decided to close out all of his heavy clothing from his Garage Store and this will make a showing that should continue to draw out-of-town traders to Charlevoix for several weeks and thereby benefit the other merchants and advertise Charlevoix.

Let us all prepare for more business during this advertising campaign Mr. Brown is paying for as the livlier the other stores are the more outsiders will talk and all will be benefited. Read the big Brown ad. in this issue also the Booster poem written by Mr. Allen.

EARLY HISTORY OF CHARLEVOIX

ment of this hostils tribe of so-ealled Mormons. Thesa peoples, whose names were Hull and Savage, had on the pretense of embarking with Strang's approval, for Drummonds Island where he proposed to plant a eolony. Once on the lake, these people laid their course for Pine River and here begged the protection of the fishermen. This protection was promised them providing the fugitives would help to protect themselves.

The Mormons desired to get a fisherman by the name of Moon, also Hull and Savage into their power, so under the color of law (the circuit eourt being at that time at St. James, proceeded with an armed party to Pine River. This day there was a quilting bee at the home of fisherman Morrison, at the mouth of the river, to which all the women were assembled. Some of the men had gone up Pine River, while the others were at the "other end of town," such as the westernmost houses in the settlement were called. Two boats were seen approaching, heading for the mouth of the river. One of the fishermen, with the aid TWO History CawlhCp of a spy glass, saw there were nine men in each of the boats. As the circumstances looked suspicious, they determined to ascertain the object of the visit at oace. Between them and the river was a stretch of beach where it was difficult to pass between the river and the bank. Launching a boat, ten or twelve men sprang into it, and rowed past the difficult passage. There they landed and proeeeded on foot, following the beach until they reached the sand hilloeks, where they turned into the wood, struek down a path that led over the bluff, and down to Morriaon's shortly. Tha Mormons were frightening the women with villainoue threats, but upon the arrival of the fishermen, the invaders eeased their threats and insisted upon having Moon, Hull and Savage. In this requeat, of eourse, tbey were rebuked and ordered off the land claimed by the fishermen. Among the fishermen was a young man, Louis Geboo, who reeognized among the party of Mormons, eome of his former acquaintancee. Thinking the danger of collision over, he proceeded to tbo boats of tha Mormons, on the mere purpose of speaking to his friends. As a matter of aimple precaution be thought it best to see if his gun was ready for effective use. Stopping a moment to examine his weapon, he falt a bullet from a Mormon's gun pierce his leg. As Geboo started to limp back to his own party they opeaed fire on the invaders, who got away with the utmost haste and were soon beyond gunshot.

A few days after this invasion, a rumor reached the fishermen that an expedition of one hundred was fitting itself out at the Mormon Island to come over and punish the settlers of Pine River. As there could be no posible hope of reeisting sueb a force, the fishermen put on board the steamer "Columbia," their families and effects and left, all except Aloah Cable who remained but a short time later. When he went away, the Pine River region was left without a white inhabitant.

Pine River appears to have remained an abandoned settlement after the hasty departure of the fishermen, until the spring of 1854, when George Preston and family from Beaver Island arrived and took possession of one of the houses on the north side of the river and at once set about clearing land and making arrnugements for a permaaent home. Soon after Galeb Cole and family arrived from the South Fox Islands and naturally took possession of another of tho vacant housee. This was the commencement of the Mormon settlement at this point. In tho fall Medad Thompson arrived and in the spring of 1855 were joined by See, Alward, who also added to the Mormon population.

In 1855, John Dixon and family, aceompanied by Wolcott and May, arrived here from Old Mission in tha sehooner "Emeline." Mr. Dixon hnd brought with bim a considerable amaunt of supplies, and he erected a temporary residence on the beach. A path was eleared along the southorn margin of the stream and later the family and goods were transported up the river, to land at the north shore where the stream leaves Round Lake. Although it was made plain to Mr. Dixon that he was not welcome, ho neverthelesa built hie homa here.

Tho eighth of July was observed by tho Mormons as tbeir principal hulday—it being tbe anniversary of Strang's coronation. Tho present summer, a largs party of Mormons came over to Pine River, seemingly on a picnic excursion. The party passed with their boats up Pine River, entered the south arm and spent the night on a small island, two miles beyond the entrance, to which they geve the name to which it has since borne, "Holy Island." The following day Mrs. Dixon noticed thst boats of the hostile enemies were towing timber. Suspecting mischief and somewhat alarmed, she reaolved to ascertain what was going forward. A Mormon neighbor, to whom she applied for information, refused to give her any. Proceeding down to the mouth of the river, she observed some of the men drawing timber from the river, and others working with spades. Upon inquiry she was told they were about to erect a gallows on which should be hanged all who violated their laws. After the Mormons left, the gallows was found standing with four roughly carved wooden images of men hanging by the necks and another standing erect on top of the frame. On one of them was the figure of a coffin drawn in red chalk, and threo men walking away from it, with thia inscription, "Dixon, successor to the Pine River, murdered, in his dying hours abandoned by his frienda."

Land at this early period, not being marked could not be bought, but only secured by what was known as the "squatter's claim," by living on the land and making improvements until such a time came that they could buy it from tha government. As fishermen came in and settled on claims, they made a compact that they would not undermine each other, which compact was strictly earried out. Tbe life of a pioneer is a hard one from all points of view. Their houses were of only one story and usually one room which served as kitchen, living room and bedroom. For lights these settlers burned fish oil in small lamps holding about a tea cup of oil. For wicks they often used a strip of cotton and sometimes THREE History tdhaaatd , fat in a saucer with a rag for a wick. Fish was plenty in these days, but fresh meat was very scarce, salt pork being the principal meat. The pioneers were compelled to do without many articles whlch we now consider absolutely essential. But still the pioneers fought bravely on.

In the eourse of the following summer, after the Mormons erected their death gallows, Mr. William Sterling and family arrlved here from Elk Rapids. After the arrival of Sterling, Messrs. Dixon and Sterling conceived the project of building a saw mill on Pine River. It was proposed to build a dam on the lower river, at some point between Round Lake and Lake Michigan. It was thought advisable that the margin of the stream and of Round Lake should first be cleared of driftwood and fallen timber which could be conveniently accomplished by the aid of a scow. Accordingly a quantity of clear stiff pine planks for the scow were brought from Elk Rapids and piled upon the banks of the river for future use.

Some time later, when both men were away, leaving the women and children alone, some lumber was stolen from the fishermen's supply. Mrs. Sterling and Mrs. Dixon spent the remainder of the night in watching, fearing violence from the Mormon thieves. Early the following morning Mrs. Dixon, leaving Mrs. Sterling and ths ehildren behind, set out on foot, for ber journey to Bear Creek, armed with a pistol, in hopes of securing aid. The distanee was fully eighteen miles, which trip sho followed the beaeh to reach her destination. When within three miles of Bear Creek, after her travsl through dense woods and tangled swamp, she came upon an inhabited wigwam and she was given a little boy to go with her as guide to the house of Mr. Porter. After reaching there it was decided that three Indians should man one of their boats and return with Mr. and Mrs. Dixon immediately. The party was not long in getting off and they arrived at Pine River about nine o'clock in the evening.

During Mrs. Dixon's absence, Mrs. Sterling had adopted an artifice to deceivo the enemy with a false show of force. Disguising herself in her husband's clothes, sbe walked about where shs would be likely to be seen by some of the Mormons, changing the suit several times in the course of the day to give the impression that there were ssveral men stopping at the house.

The next morning Messrs. Dixon and Sterling resolved to make an effort to recover tho stolen property. They went up Pine Lake and meeting two Mormons questioned them, but they denied all knowledge of the missing property. At the mouth of Porter's Creek, the lumber was found on the beach, but the boat could not be found. Tbey took the lumber and prepared to return, but Mr. Sterling wished to remain saying that ha hoped to kill ths Mormons and recover the stolen boat. During Mr. Sterling's stay at Pine River, he was inclined to resort to sanguinary measures in the contest with the Mormons, but was over-ruled by the milder counsels of Mr. Dixon. Finally, convinced thet the project of building the mill could not be carried out in peace, Mr. Sterling dissolved his connection with Mr. Dixon, and left the place.

In the meantime, the Mormons at Porter's Creek commenced a suit against Dixon and Sterling, befora a Mormon justice of the peace at Pine River, for the value of the timber they had seized and brought home. The defendants, thinking the plaintiffs would have everything their own way in the trial, thought it better to settle the claim by paying for their own property than to risk the probable result. The matter was accordingly arranged to the satisfaction of the Mormons.

Mr. Dixon, having become thoroughly discouraged by the constant annoyance of the villainous Mormons, sent for a steamer which soon arrived and took away Mrs. Dixon and family to Northport, who were in a few weeks joined by Mr. Dixon. In 1856 occurred the assassination of "King" Strang and the forcible expulsion of the Mormons from Beaver Island followed. The driving out of the Mormons left Medad Thompson and his family the only inhabitants of Pina River. About the first of August, however, he was joined by Horton Newman and Archie Buttars. After the expulsion of the Mormons, Mr. Dixon determined to return from Northport. He first visited Beaver Island, where he recovered bis former stolen property and conveyed it to Pine River. Gradually the site of Pine River was increasing with the continued inflow of families.

The act of legislature, which reorganized the county of Emmet divided it into several townships, and provided for holding the first townehip meeting and the first eleetion of county officers.

The township meetings in all towaships except Charlevoix were to be held on the first Tuesday in May; that in Charlevoix being the last Tuesday in May. Neither townships nor county eleetion was observed in any township except Charlavoix. Mr. Dixon was serving as the clerk of tbe election. There were eight legal voters present—five Mormons, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Wolcott and Frank May. Of course as the legal vote stood five Mormons to three Gentiles, a Mormon township boerd was elected. At the time of county elegtion, which occurred one week afterwards, about fifty Mormons came over to Charlevoix from Beaver Island and were allowed by the recently elected board, to vote. What ulterior measures the Mormons had in view in proceeding to carry out the township, can only be surmised. If it was a preparation for carrying out in the future, a far reaching scheme for keeping the county completely uader the political control of their own party, which seems probabls, the death of Strang and the breaking up of the Mormon kingdom the following year, put en end to this. Of the townships organized in this questionable manner, two—Evangeline and Eveline—retain their names and Eveline even retains her original boundaries at the present day.

To ons having an eye to either beauty or business, the banks of Pine River, early presented attractions as an eligible site for a town. A mile back from the shore of Lake Michigan lies Pine Lake, its two arms stretching away to the southwest, long distances into the interior. Between it and Lake Michigan lies Round Lake covering an area of one hundred acres or more. Pine River, the outlet to Pine Lake, in its course to Lake Michigan, ran directly through it. Ths river in its natural state was a narrow, crooked, swiftly flowing stream, full of snags and over hung with trees, as unlike the broad deep and almost straight channel through which large steamers now go up Pine Lake, as one ean well imagine. But it took tadious and strenuous labor to produce this well built ehannel from the stream it once was. The improvements for Charlevoix harbor and tbe opening of tbis channel were of incalculable advantage to Charlevoix county, in fact without this great improvement tbe county could not have attained its present state of development. The whole region of Pine Lake was cut off from the commerce of Lake Michigan by a narrow sand ridge that separated it from Round Lake. Only canoes and Mackinac boats entered and the latter were towed along tbe south bank with dificulty.

In 1868 a survcy of Pine River was made by Major Wheeler who reported insurmountable obstacles in the way of making a harbor, and that a harbor of refuge was not necessary at this point, owing to its proximity to other good harbors.

In June, 1869, books were opened at the office of Redington, Nelson and company for subscriptions for the improvement of Pine River.

In July there was a "bee" to open the channel between Round Lake and Pine Lake. A force of upward of one hundred men were divided and one squad began on the lower river, and the other squad worked at the upper cut. The cut is twenty-two rods in length, and the ridge was originally covered with a heavy growth of timber. The whole space, about three hundred feet in width, was cleared of timber during the day.

The Charlevoix Harbor and River Improvement company was duly incorporated, and its object was stated to be the deepening of Pine River from a depth of twelve feet of water in Pine Lake to the same depth in Lake Michigan.

LYDIA of the Pines

through the dusk at the shallowy sweetness of Lydia's face, his own face calm and thoughtful.

"You're so good and kind to me," Lydia began again, "how can you be so hard on the Indians? Are you stealing Charlie's hogs? Are you, Mr. Levine?"

"I bought his pine," replied Levine quietly.

"He doesn't believe it. He thinks you're stealing. And he's so afraid of you. Why does he feel that way, Mr. Levine?"

"Lydia! What're you saying!" exclaimed Amos.

"Keep out, Amos," said Levine. "We've got to clear this up. I've been expecting it, for some time. Lydia, years ago before the government began to support the Indians, they were a fine, upstanding race. The whites could have learned a lot from them. They were brave, and honorable, and moral, and in a primitive way, thrifty. Well—then the sentimentalists among the whites devised the reservation system and the allowance system. And the Indians have gone to the devil. Just as whites would under like circumstances. Any human being has to earn what he eats or he degenerates. The only way to save those Indians up there is to kick them out. The strong ones will live and be assimilated into our civilization. The weak ones will die. Just like weak whites do."

"But how about Charlie's pines?" insisted Lydia. "What makes him think you're stealing them? And he says that when the pines go, the tribe will die."

"I paid for the pine," insisted Levine. "An Indian has no idea of buying and selling. It's a cruel incident, this breaking up of the reservation, but it's like cutting off a leg to save the patient's life. Sentiment is wasted."

Lydia was turning over in her mind the scene in the woods between John and the half-breeds. That, then, was a part of the process of removing the patient's leg! The end justified the means.

She heaved a great sigh of relief. "Well, then, I don't have to worry about that any more," she said. "Only, I don't dare to think about those starving old squaws, or the baby that froze to death."

"That's right," agreed Levine, comfortably. "Don't think about them."

If there was still a doubt in the back of Lydia's mind regarding the reservation, for a time, at least, she succeeded in quieting it.

One of the not unimportant results of the camping trip was that Lydia rediscovered the pine by the gate. It was the same pine against which she had beaten her little fists the night of Patience's death.

She liked to sit on the steps and stare at it, dreaming and wondering. For the Indians and the pines were now unalterably associated in Lydia's mind. The life of one depended on that of the other. Strange thoughts and perhaps not altogether cheerful and wholesome thoughts for a girl of Lydia's age.

So it was probably well that Margery about this time began to show Lydia certain Margery-esque type of attention. In her heart, in spite of her mother's teachings, Margery had always shared her father's admiration for Lydia. In her childhood it had been a grudging, jealous admiration that seemed like actual dislike. But as Margery developed as a social favorite and Lydia remained about the same quiet little dowd, the jealousy of the banker's daughter gave way to liking.

Therefore, several times a week Margery appeared on her bicycle, her embroidery bag dangling from the handle bars. The two girls would then establish themselves on cushions by the water and sew and chatter.

One day Lydia said, "I wish we had hardwood floors like yours."

"What kind are yours?" inquired Margery.

"Just pine, and kind of mean, splintery pine, too.

"Upstairs at Olga's all the floors were that way," said Margery, "and they had a man come and sandpaper 'em and put kind of putty stuff in the cracks and oil and wax 'em and they look fine."

"Gee!" said Lydia, thoughtfully. "I'll do it! And I'll cut our old living-room carpet up into two or three rugs. Lizzie'll have to squeeze enough out of the grocery money for fringe. I'd rather have fringe than a full coat."

Amos, coming home a night or so later, found the living-room floor bare and Lydia hard at work with a bit of glass and sandpaper, scraping at the silvers.

"Ain't it awful?" asked Lizzie from the dining room. "She would do it."

"Lizzie's complained all day," said Lydia. "She doesn't realize how our house looks like 'poverty and destruction' compared with other folks'. I'm going to get some style into it. If I have to tear it down. Oh, daddy, don't you get sick of being poor?"

"Yes," said Amos, shortly, "and I think you're a silly girl to wear yourself out on this kind of thing."

Lydia sat up and looked at him. She was growing fast and was thinner than ever, this summer. "If mother was alive," she said, "she'd know exactly how I feel."

Suddenly there came to Amos' memory a weak and tender voice, with contralto notes in it like Lydia's. "Lydia," he said, abruptly, "make the house over if you want to, my dear," and he marched out to the kitchen to wash and take off his overalls.

It took Lydia several days to complete her task. When it was done the cracks were still prominent and the oily finish was spotted. But in Lydia's eyes it was a work of art and she cut the old carpet into three parts with enthusiasm. She sewed the fringe on the rugs, on the front porch. Sitting so, she could see Margery when she appeared far down the road. On the afternoon on which she finished the last of the rugs Charlie Jackson and not Margery appeared.

He admired the rugs and the gleam of the shining floor through the doorway. Then, without preamble, he asked, "Did you talk to Levine, Lydia?"

"Yes," she said. "He—he just doesn't see it any way but his, Charlie! He insists that the only way to save you Indians is to make you work for a living."

"He's doing it all for our good, huh?" sneered Charlie.

"He doesn't pretend. He says he wants the land. He's paying for it, though."

"Paying for it!" cried the Indian. "How's he paying for it, do you know?"

"No, and I don't want to know! I'm tired of hearing things about Mr. Levine."

"I don't care if you are," said Charlie, grimly. "You might as well decide right now whether you're going to take him or me for your friend. You can't have us both."

"I wouldn't give up Mr. Levine for anyone on earth," Lydia's voice shook with her earnestness. "And I don't see why I have to be dragged into this business. I've nothing to do with it."

"Father Put Up an Awful Fight and They Killed Him."

"You have, too! You're white, and it's every white's business to judge in this. You'll be taking some of the profits of the reservation if it's thrown open, yourself."

"I will not!" cried Lydia. "I wouldn't want an inch of that land." Then she caught her breath. Something within her said, "Wouldn't, eh—not the vast acres of cathedral pines, you thought of as yours, at camp?" She flushed and repeated vehemently, "Not an inch!"

Charlie smiled cynically. "Listen, Lydia, I'll tell you how Levine pays for his Indian lands."

CHAPTER XII

The High School Senior

"Years ago," began Charlie, grimly, "my father foresaw what the whites were trying to do. None of the other full-bloods believed him. Father was the chief of the tribe and he called council after council until at last they all decided he'd better go to Washington and see if he could get help from the Indian commissioner. Even then John Levine had a following of half-breeds. He told the yellow cuss to kidnap my father and he'd see if he could make him more reasonable. So the half-breeds laid in ambush the day father started for Washington. Father put up an awful fight and they killed him!"

"Oh, Charlie!" cried Lydia, dropping her sewing. "Oh, Charlie!"

"Yes," said the Indian, tensely, "and though Levine wasn't there he was just as much my father's murderer as if he'd fired the shot. Of course, nothing was ever done by the authorities. It was hushed up as an Indian brawl. But my sister, she was twenty then, she found out about Levine and she came in and set fire to his house one night, thinking she'd burn him to death. Instead of that, she just scared his old hired man, who was drunk. Levine was away from home. But he's a devil. He found out it was my sister and he told her the only way she could keep from being jailed was to sell him all our pines—for a hundred dollars. So she did, but she shot at him that Thanksgiving night when he'd been at your house."

"Oh, Charlie!" whispered Lydia, horror in her blue eyes and her parted lips. She looked at him in utter dismay. No longer was he the debonair favorite of the high school. In his somber eyes, his thin, cold lips, his tense shoulders the young girl saw the savage. But she knew the tale was true.

She moistened her dry lips. "But what can I do, Charlie! I'm only a girl."

"I'll tell you what you can do. You can throw down your murderer friend and side with me. You can get everyone you know to side with me. And, Lydia, never tell Levine, or anyone else, what you know about him. It wouldn't be safe!"

He leaned toward her as he spoke and Lydia shivered. "I won't," she whispered. Then she said aloud in sudden resentment, "But I'm not going to throw Mr. Levine down without his having a chance to explain. Who are you to think you've got a right to ask me? I'm just a girl. I want to be happy just a little while before I grow up. I've had too much unhappiness."

"Yes, you have had," agreed Charlie, grimly, "and that's why you will think about it in spite of yourself. You understand how I feel because you've suffered. When are you going to throw Levine down?"

Lydia's face whitened. "Never!" she said.

"What! When you know he's a murderer?"

"He never intended to kill your father. Anyhow, I can't help what he's done. He's like my own father and brother and mother all in one to me."

The two young people sat looking into each other's eyes. Suddenly Charlie threw Lydia's hand from him, and, like Billy Norton, he strode down the path and out of the gate without a word.

Levine did not appear at the cottage for several days. During that time Lydia tried to put Charlie's story out of her mind.

A Rare Jewel could give no greater joy than a Maytag

NOT only will a Maytag Aluminum Washer be a gift of joy and satisfaction but its helpfulness will bring new satisfaction week after week, year after year. A more perfect gift can not be found at any price.

No other washer has a cast-aluminum, lifetime, heat-retaining tub. A tub that holds more clothes than ordinary washers. A tub that cleans itself in 30 seconds after the washing is done. Only the Maytag washes a big tubful of clothes in 3 to 7 minutes, and washes so thoroughly that no hand-rubbing is necessary—even of cuffs and collars.

A Maytag must win you on its first washing in your home, or you are not obligated to keep it.

ALL CROPS HURT BY WET WEATHER

16 DAYS OF RAIN MAKES HARVESTING IMPOSSIBLE

Loss to Bean Growers in East Central Part of State Has Been Exceedingly Heavy

The harvesting of fall crops was greatly hindered by wet weather throughout October. With an average of 16 rainy days and the occurrence of precipitation in some part of the stnte on every day of the month, it was impossible to make satisfactory progress with the harvesting of corn, beans, buckwheat and clover seed. All of these crops contains nn excess of moisture and have suffered more or less damage in the fields, according to the monthly report issued by L. Whitney Watkins, Commissioner of Agriculture and Verne H. Church, U. S. Agricultural Statistician for Michigan. The losses to bean growers in the east-central counties hava becu exceedingly heavy. Fair progress was made in securing the fruit, sugar beet and potato crops in most sections.

Corn: Michigan's corn yield is estimated nt 34.0 bushels per acre, 1.8 bushels abovo the ten-year average but 0.0 bushels less than in 1925. The theoretical total production based on this yield is 54,162,000 bushels as compared with 65,680,000 last year. As only 57 per cent of the crop is husked for the grain, the actual grain production this year is 30,872,000 bushels. Three per cent of tha crop was put into silos nnd 10 per cent was utilized for forage, grazing and hogging down. The grain contains much excess moisture and only nbout 45 per cent reached maturity before tha severa freeza on September 26. As a rosult, tha merchantable quality is placed at 55 per cent as compared with 83 per cent last year and 72 por cent, the ten-year average. The remaining 45 per cent is of low feeding valua, soft, and very poor in keeping quality.

Potatoes: Yields vary considerably between dlfferent sections and between individual farms but, on the wbole, the late crop has yielded well and better than expected befora digging commeneed. Only a small percentage remained unbarvested on November 1. Tbe averago yield is 122 bushels per acre, giving a total crop of 30,378,000 bushels. Last year's crop amounted to 24,411,000 bushels, botb tbe acreage and yield being less than in 1926. The quality is estimated at 87 per cent which is the same as the ten-year average. There was practically no late blight although there is some rot on heavy soils due to exeessive moisture. In a few localities, there was some over-sized stock and hollow-heart. This condition was most prevalent in the counties bordering on Lake Michigan where no frost occurred to stop growth. On the whole, the crop is of excellent quality, an average of 92 per cent grading U. S. No. 1 in the chief commercial sections.

The total crop of the United States is estimated at 360,727,000 bushels, an increase of about 10 millions over the previous month's report, as yields in several states were better than expected. This crop is about 36 millions greater than last year's, but is still short of usunl requirements by 20 or 25 million bushels.

Beans: Continuous wet, cold and cloudy weather during October greatly hindered harvesting and enormously increased the damage to the crop. On November 1 a considerable quantity was still in the fields. In Sanilac, Huron, and portions of several counties in the east-central district, the unharvested portion probably amounted to 50 per cent of the total acreage. In other sections, the harvest was completed during October with the exception of occasional fields. But little threshing has been done and the beans being marketed carry an excess of moisture and are picking heavily. Many lots are too poor in quality to warrant the expense of picklng. Considerable acreage has been abandoned and fields that have not been pulled to date will be abandoned unless more favorable weather develops soon. As a result of the present chaotic and uncertain condition it was impracticable to make any inquiry on November 1. As soon as harvesting is discontinued for the season, a survey of the acreaga abandoned, percentage merchantable piek and yiald will ba made. Present indications point to a considerably smaller merchantabla crop than that of last year.

Sugar Beets: Harvesting began early in October but, owing to tha prevalenea of rainy weather, it has progressed rather slowly and with considerable diffleulty in removing the beets from low, flat lands. Tha averaga yiold is 9.0 tons per aere, making tha total crop 1,044,000 tons as compared with 069,000 tons in 1025.

The estimated amount for tha United States is 7,213,000 tons of beets from which a production of 938,000 tons of sugar is expeeted.

Tha most important thing in the world for many people during the past two weaks was the world's series.

BE CAREFUL OF YOUR SEED CORN

MICHIGAN FARMERS WARNED BY EXPERT AGRICULTURISTS

Hundreds of Acres of Michigan Corn Stands Now in Fields on Account of Surplus Rain

Michigan farmers will be seriously handicapped in their corn planting next spring, unless they take special care now in sclecting and storing their seed corn, aecording to a statement issued by the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Continued rains and overflowing streams have cnused much of the Michigan corn to stand in muddy fields in the past month, and exceptional care must be taken by the farmer who wants a good stand and who would reduce his feed bill next spring.

"Good seed corn next spring will depend on artificial heat and ventilation that is given it at this time in the fnll," the Foundation states. "As it comes from the fields in the fall, seed corn contains 25 to 35 per cent moisture, and this moisture content must be reduced to about 12 to 15 per cent if the corn is to pass through tha winter without losing the vitality of the seed. Corn properly dried will not be greatly damaged by freezing, so that it is very important that immediately after picking, the corn be placed where it will receive free ventilation in order to dry it rapidly. This done, the corn should be stored where it will not be exposed to extreme cold.

"Any arrangement the farmer can make for drying the seed corn is all right, providing there is plenty of ventilation. Corn trees, wire racks, bag strings to tie the ears, or any other method usable and expedient will do. Care should be taken, however, that the moisture laden ears de not touch. Drying corn on porches, sides of buildings or on the windmill should be avoided, as this results in lowered germination next spring because of freezing."

THE SAME OLD STORY—WE LOSE

Cheboygan Footballists Last to Defeat Charlevox H. S.

The Cheboygan football squad came to Charlevoix last Saturday imbued with the mighty notion of defeating the home eleven with as great a score as Petoskey had won.

Charlevoix, however, played their best game of the season. Receiving kick-off we punted, which was blocked. Cheboygan was 20 yards from goal but failed to get it over. Charlevoix punted out, see-sawed the ball between territories until the second quarter. In this quarter a punt went wild, Cheboygan scoring a touchdown, but failed the point resulting in a score of 6-0 at the end of the half.

In the second half on the kick-off the ball was stolen from Red McCann. When Charlevoix again gained the ball, they started a new play with Cooper carrying the ball and making gains of 10 and 15 yards. Higman, also carrying the ball, made similar gains. Cheboygan on blocked punt won another touchdown but failed to score the point resulting in a 12-0 score at tha end of the third quarter. Charlevoix played better ball in the last quarter, holding their opponents to the 12-0 score. Stars were McCann, Cooper, Higman and Gill. Cooper is a likely candidate for all-northern end.

Coach Buchen announeas that practice in basket ball will begin the first Monday after Thanksgiving in Hooker's garnge.

M. E. CHURCH TO OBSERVE THANKSGIVING

Realistic Vesper Service Next Sunday Afternoon

A Thanksgiving service, at the Vesper hour, which will be unique because it comprises certain elements that were in evidence at the first Thanksgiving service, will be rendered at the First Methodist Episcopal church in Charlevoix next Sunday afternoon by the pastor assisted by the combined choirs of the Indian and Charlevoix Methodist Episcopal churches.

Certain of the Indians who are excellent singers will bo dressed in Indian costumes and will render some of their wonderful music in the Ojibwa tongue. "King Massasoit" and his two sons, "Philip" and "Alexander," will be represented by real Indians. "Gov. Bradford" and "Gov. Winslow" will have an opportunity to speak officially. The First Methodist choir, costumed very suggestively of Pilgrim days, will render excellent music and the pastor will speak on the subject, "The Old Time Religion." Suitable and suggestive decorations will be much in evidence.

The entire service will center around the idea of the original purpose of Thanksgiving as conceived by our Pilgrim fathers and mothers. The public is invited. The hour is 4:15 p. m. next Sunday afternoon.

LOCAL BAND TO PUT ON CONCERT

Data and Place to Be Announced at Later Dato

The Charlevoix City Band is planning on giving another musical event in the near future that will be far more entertaining and interesting than former occasions of this kind.

The date and placo where the entertainment will take place has not as yet been fully decided, but will be announced next week in the columns of the Courier.

The band has been reorganized this fall and is now making rapid progress under the able leadership of Hubert Bearss, the new director. New members have been added, and more than usual interest is being taken.

This is an event that deserves a crowded house. The Charlevoix band deserves the support of every loyal citizen. Give the boys every encouragement and be sure and keep and open date for this event.

CHARLEVOIX COURIER

VOLUME 33. NUMBER 47. EIGHT PAGES. COURIER, CHARLEVOIX, MICH., WEDNESDAY NOVEMBER 24, 1926 PRICE $2.00 PER YEAR

WILL VOTE ON SCHOOL AGAIN

SPECIAL ELECTION— CALLED FOR DECEMBER 8th.

$225,000.00 Bond Issue Needed to Construct Central School Building to Replace Old

The board of education, having been petitioned by a large number af voters to again submit the school proposition, voted at their meeting last Monday evening to call a special meeting for this purpose.

The election will be held Wednesday evening, December 8th, from 10:00 a. m. to 8:00 p. m. The question to be voted upon is whether the district shall borrow the sum of $225,000.00 to be payable inside of 30 years and issue the bonds of said school district for erecting and furnishing a new high school and grade building.

Qualifications for voting are as follows:

1. Full citizenship of the United States.
2. Twenty-one years of age.
3. Resident of the district at least three months next preceeding the election.
4. Own property, real or personal, assessed for school taxes in the district.

The board has in mind housing all the grades in one central building and [illegible] transportation to [illegible] probably others living [illegible] This is especially necessary for the children who must [illegible] from the north side. By housing [illegible] in a central building, the cost of maintaining and operating four seperate buildings will be eliminated.

Charlevoix has carried on a comprehensive program of street, park, light and water improvements, but has sadly neglected her schools. All our buildings lack modern equipment and the high school is overcrowded. The proposition was defeated at the special election held August 30th. Good schools are any communities' most important asset and it is hoped that the vote cast December 8th will show a reversal of opinion. We shall have more to say on the subject next week regarding the payment of the bonds and how it will effect our tax rate.

CHARLEVOIX TO HAVE NEW DREDGING OUTFIT

F. C. Sears Purchases John Naylor and Equipment

Franklin C. Sears has recently purchased the John Naylor, pile driver, from John Monroe of East Jordan, and will completely equip it with new machinery for this class of work.

The new outfit will be known as the Sears Dock & Dredging Company, with Mr. Sears as manager. The Naylor is now anchored in the south arm near the Sears Fox Ranch, where it will be completely overhauled and the new equipment installed. When completed they will be able to tackle any job of water front work, including pile driving and dredging.

With pending improvements in Charlevoix harbor and Pine Lake, the new company should enjoy a very prosperous season during the coming year.

SHALL WE EXPECT A COLD ONE THIS WINTER

A southern Michigan man home from a four days trip on Saginaw Bay brought back nine different species of ducks for the museum at Ann Arbor. The species were rare for Michigan. He also says if the presence of certain species of birds could be taken as any indication of a hard winter, we would get a "hummer," for he saw flocks of thousands of snow buntings, Lapland long spurs and northernhorned larks, seen here only in extremely cold weather. He also saw buffel heads, commonly known as butter balls and golden eye ducks, commonly known as "whistle" which like the above have been known to appear in these localities only in very cold weather. He found three different species of wild geese—snow geese, blue geese and Canada geese—and several hundred whistling swan.

Take this for what it is worth. There is one certainty about this northern Michigan weather. We may get snowed under, but never flooded out.

BAND CONCERT NEXT FRIDAY EVENING

Entertainment to be Held in Methodist Church

The band concert by the Charlevoix City Band, announcement of which was made in the columns of the Courier last week, will be held in the Methodist church on Friday evening of this week starting at 8:00 o'clock.

Among the numbers to be played are several the band has learned since its reorganization, and they are said to be unusually good. Remember, the proceeds of the evening will be used to purchase additional instruments which means more players and a bigger and better band. The boys are deserving of a packed house.

An admission charge of 10 cents for children and 25 cents for adults will be charged. The boys are doing their part toward giving the city a good band, now let's us, as citizens, do our part and fill every seat in the church.

MINSTREL SHOW FRIDAY, DEC. 3

UNDER AUSPICES OF C. H. S. ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION

Making Effort to Pay Up Indebtedness Incurred During Football Season

Charlevoix High School Athletic Association will put on a minstrel show at the Palace Theatre the night of Friday, December 3rd. The boys have been working hard for the last four weeks, and at present practice each night to put the show in smooth condition.

Thirty men will make up the cast, twenty-two in the chorus and eight on ends. Solo parts will be taken by Hubert McCann, Norman Shanahan, George Higman, Ho Helms, Keith Wagner, Dean Davenport, Bradley Atchison and Bud Gill. These boys will show that they are not only proficient on the athletic field, but on the concert platform as well.

The end men have worked up a line of talk which is guaranteed to furnish at least a hundred laughs. The harmony furnished by the entire company will be the great feature of the show. Special costumes and scenery will add zest to this part of the show.

In addition to the above a one act farce will be presented by a group of Juniors entitled "Who Kissed Barbara." Between the two acts, five high school acrobats will give feats of tumbling, twirling and diving, directed and assisted by Coach Buchan.

An evening of fun and laughter awaits anyone who attends the minstrel show next Friday evening. You will not only get more than your moneys worth during the evening's entertainment, but you will also be helping the boys pay their indebtness incurred during the football season. Turn out and give them all the encouragement you can.

ENTERTAIN WITH BRIDGE AND DINNER PARTY

Mrs. Clinton Cooper Hostess to Thirty-two Friends

One of the social events of the season occurred Thursday evening of last week when Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Cooper entertained thirty-two friends with a bridge-dinner. The Cooper home at 104 Ainslee street was effectively decorated with baby crysanthemums and tall cathedral candles, the predominating color being yellow.

Guests were: Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Bridge, Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Levinson, Mr. and Mrs. H. I. Ochs, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Emery, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Redpath, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bonthron, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Partridge, Mr. and Mrs. P. D. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. Larry Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Craig, Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Lewis, Dr. and Mrs. Fronk Wilkinson, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Wood, Mr. and Mrs. James Gaskins, Sr., and Mr. and Mrs. J. Niver of Boyne City.

The first prize at bridge was awarded to Mr. and Mrs. Larry Chase, the second, to Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Levinson.

DONATION WEEK NOW UNDER WAY

ENTIRE STATE TO HELP MICHIGAN'S UNFORTUNATES

County Units to Aid in the Work— Economic Value of Each Child is Big

This is Thanksgiving Week, and while we are about to pause from the everyday affairs of life, it is well that we also remember the work that is being done in this state by the Michigan Society For Crippled Children. This organization, which was brought into being five years ago, now plans a state-wide organization for bringing help to the nearly 13,000 crippled children in the state. Certainly nothing could be finer in spirit.

The object of organizing county units is to find and insure the care, treatment and education, with adequate "follow-up" supervision af every crippled child in the county. Also to give support to state-wide work for crippled children. Later the legislature will be asked to aid in this work, but until it is ultimately taken over by the state the financial responsibility must be met by popular subscriptions. Half of the money raised in the counties remains there to be used in county work, the rest going to aid in the general work in the state.

Get in touch with your county organization and tell them that here's your dollar to aid in the cause. All of us can spare the small amount asked, and be thankful during this week of thankfulness that we have been given this opportunity through men who had this vision to help crippled children and are now engaged in rescuing them without money or pay to themselves.

A Paying Investment

The economic value of the life of a self-supporting person to the state is estimated at ten thousand dollars. It is conservately estimated that there are 12,500 crippled children in Michigan.

When a child, helpless or partially so, either from deformity or desease, can be cured, either completely or to a degree where it becomes self-supporting, it changes from a care and expense to the community to a contributor, a crentor of the wealth of the state or community.

When, through our efforts as individuals, or an organization of individuals, one hundred children are taken in hand and by treatments or operations cured in whole or in part, so they become self-supporting, we are not only giving a fellow being a chance to enjoy life, but we are adding a million dollars to the economic value of our state and community.

Counties where no organization was prefected in time for "Enrollment Week" may send their contributions direct to Paul H. King, 648 Buhl Building, Detroit, secretary-treasurer of this organization. In that case proper acknowledgment of your contribution will be made direct to you.

EARLY HISTORY OF CHARLEVOIX

FACTS FORGOTTEN EVEN BY PIONEERS SETTLERS

History Class of C. H. S. Prepare Very Creditable Account of Charlevoix—Read It

This graphic account of the history of the site of Charlevoix from the time of the Indians to the present, was prepared by the history class of the Charlevoix high school under the able direction of Miss Velera Keller, teacher. It is replete with names, dates and incidents, gathered here and there, and put into compact form. We are glad for the opportunity to publish it. Those new to Charlevoix and its environs will be interested, while to the older settlers it will serve to refresh memories that, once started, will bring forth many incidents now forgotten. It is mighty good reading. Clip it for future reference or send it to a friend you know will be interested. It will be published in two installments. The second one follows:

In September work was prosecuted with vigor. The bar at the mouth of the river was dredged, and slab piers, two hundred feet in length, built by filling under the pile deck of Fox and Rose

October, 8th, the "Mendota" was towed into the harbor, being the first vessel to enter Round Lake.

In the summer of 1870 the tug "Minnie Warren" again dredged through the power river, and in August the "Maple Leaf" was towed into Round Lake, and it was thought to be an important event in the history of navigation at this point.

In February the north pier was located and work commenced. The weather was extremely cold and the work was prosecuted with great difficulty. Very good progress was made and about 450 feet of the sub-structure sunk, but stone was obtained with difficulty. The available funds were exhausted and frequent storms played havoc. Finally in the spring of 1872, one morning it was found that the pier had gone to pieces, and it looked as if the whole enterprise must be abandoned. The damage, however, was repaired, and the work thus begun finally incorporated in the government work.

In June, 1873, a contract was closed with N. Stickney for dredging the channel of Pine River and the following July the dredge arrived and work was begun.

In January, 1875, Representative E. H. Green introduced a resolution which was passed by the legislature asking Congress to make an appropriation for the completion and protection of the improvements at Pine River.

The cut between Round and Pine Lakes was made thirty-five feet wide and twelve feet deep by an appropriation of $1,000 made by the board of supervisors.

In the spring of 1876 an appropriation of $10,000 was made by the government, and Charlevoix was made a port of entry.

The first dredging under the government appropriation was done in July, 1877. July 7, 1882, the steamer "Fountain City," one thousand burden, enter Round Lake for the first time. This improvement has been the making of Charlevoix County. Boats drawing twelve feet of water, now easily enters the harbor, and the whole region is open to the commerce of Lake Michigan.

At an early day Mr. Dixon surveyed and platted a part of what is now tha City of Charlevoix, in the sheltered basin lying south of the lower river and west of Round Lake.

At that time, furnishing wood for the steamer craft navigating the Great Lakes, was a profitable business, where wood was accessible. Charlevoix was only a few miles off the usual route of passing steamers. Messrs. Fox and Rose, who were enguged in the wood trade at Northport, saw the advantages of the situation where was an unlimited tract of hardwood forest from which Pine Lake and the river afforded means of cheap transporation to the shore. In 1863 an arrangement was entered into between them and Mr. Dixon mutually advantageous to the contracting parties. In consideration of their building a wharf and establishing business, Mr. Dixon conveyed to them a narrow strip of land along the shore of Lake Michigan, which gave them the control of the lake

Indians Dressed in Native Costume, Render Vocal Selections—Another Event Coming

The Thanksgiving Vesper Service rendered at the Methodist Episcopal church last Sunday afternoon was appreciated by a large company of people, some of whom came from Petoskey and Harbor Springs for the particular occasion.

The following program was rendered practically as scheduled. The sermon however, was postponed until next Sunday morning owing to the length of the musical portion of the program. Mrs. George Greensky of Bay Shore, dressed in Indian costume, greatly pleased the big congregation with several vocal selections. These she sang partly in Ojibwa and partly in English. The program follows:

Orchestral voluntary.
Processional, "How Firm a Foundation."
Pastoral explanation of the service.
Duet, "Hold Thou My Hands", Robert Edwards, Claude Greenway.
Hymn, "America."
"Goveraor Bradford," Thanksgiving proclamation.
Indian selection.
"Miles Standish," A letter descriptive of the First Thanksgiving.
Indian selection.
Prayer, William Petoskey, pastor.
Amthema, "To Thee the Glory." First Methodist Choir.
Scripture read in Ojibwa language.
Indian selection.
Offertory.
Orchestra.
Doxology, Indians in Ojibwa, whites in English, unison singing.
Sermon, "The Old Time Religion."
Solo, vocal, "Bow Down Thine Ears," Robert Edwards, Petoskey.
Recessional, "Onward Christian Soldiers."
Orchestra.

December 19th is the date selected for the next Vesper Service in this church.

MARRIED SUNDAY AT BAPTIST PARSONAGE

Newly Weds Will Spend the Winter in the South

Oral Devilla Lewis, son of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lewis of Charlevoix and Miss Lola Hinshaw, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Russell Hinshaw of Suttons Bay, were united in marriage at the Baptist parsonage, Sunday, November 21st., Rev. Herman Burns officiating.

The bridal couple are well and favorably known in the city, the groom having served the Emrey Clothing store in the capacity of manager for some time previous to the closing out of the business; the bride having been employed as stenographer in the State Savings Bank for the past three years. They were attended during the ceremony by Mr. and Mrs. Walker Miles.

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis left Monday on an extended trip through Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas and Texas.

PETOSKEY WINS NORTHERN TITLE

COP NINE STRAIGHT GAMES OF HARO SCHEDULE

Final Game for Local Eleven to Be Played Against Independents on Thursday

Clear title to the championship of the region from Big Rapids across the state to Alpena and north to the Straits was won by the blue and white Petoskey team last Saturday afternoon when she passed, ran and smashed her way to a 19 to 0 victory over Traverse City, last remaining team on Petoskey's schedule of nine games.

Nearly every northern Michigan city was represented among the fans attending the game, the battle being the only one in northern Michigan for Saturday. Petoskey has had no easy schedule throughout the season, having played Boyne City, Sault Ste. Marie, Cadillac, Traverse City, Charlevoix, East Jordan, Alpena, Harbor Springs and Mancelona, the first four named being the toughest on the schedule. The extent of the Hessmen's superiority is shown when one learns that they have scored 264 or an average of 29.3 points per game, against 9, or an average of 1 point per game for her opponents. This is believed to be a record for a Michigan high school.

The Petoskey team had shown a steady improvement in form throughout the season and climaxed the season with almost a college bruad of football in the final struggle with Traverse.

The local eleven will wind up their football season by taking on the Independents, a team composed of former high school stars, on Thanksgiving Day. Although they have been on the losing end of the score in all except one game, the local squad has played a good brand of football for an inexperienced team. With the loss of but a couple regulars from this years squad, prospects look bright for the 1927 season.

The game Thursday will be a fast one and fans are urged to turn out. The proceeds are needed for the athletic association, which ran in debt doring the season just closed They are depending upon your support.

AUTO SKIDDING RESULTS IN BROKEN ARM

James Simmons Now In Hospital at Petoskey

James Simmons, of the firm Block & Simmons, is in a hospital in Petoskey with a badly broken arm, the result of an auto accident last Thursday evening.

Mr. Simmons was on his way to Petoskey with Lisle Shanahan when the accident occurred. They drove by the way of Boyne City, where Mr. Shannhan has business to attend to. From Boyne City they went to Boyne Falls, and thence from there over M-13 to Petoskey.

The accident took place at a sharp turn in the road just north of Clarion. Driving was very difficult on account of the heavy snow fall, and Mr. Shanahan, who was driving, failed to see the turn ia time to slow down sufficiently to take the turn without the car skidding.

When the car began to slide, Mr. Simmons attemped to jump and from what we can learn, had just opened the door when they sideswiped a road sign. The result was a broken arm from the contact ar being thrown to the pavement. The break was in the forearm, just below the elbow, and it will be sometime before the injured man will be able to use his arm.

Onaway Awarded Decision

TURTLE LAKE BUCKS IN DEADLY COMBAT

Keeper Witnesses Sight Seldom Seen by Anyone

One of the keepers, working at the Tortle Lake hunting grounds was forced to kill a big buck the other day, and thereby commit a technical violation of the state game law.

He came upon a pair of large antlered fellows locked in deadly combat, that is they had been fighting and their horns were locked. He made an effort to separate them but to no avail. Going back to procure a gun, thinking that if he killed one of them he could free the other, when he came to the scene of the fight after getting the gun he found that one of the animals had been killed in the fight and the other one was so far gone that he was compelled to kill it. We have heard some of the old timers tell of finding the remains of a pair of bucks with their horns locked together but took it all with the proverbial grain of salt However this was witnessed by others and the matter properly reported to the game department.—Montmorency Tribune.

HOG CHOLERA HITS COUNTY

DESEASE COMES WHEN SERUM IS HARD TO GET

Farmers are Warned by County Agent to Use Care to Prevent Desease

Hog cholera has again made its appearance in Emmet county says the Petoskey Evening News. In other sections of the state as well as in the corn belt, hog cholera in both the chronic and the acute forms is spreading rapidly. At this season of the year the disease spreads much more rapidly than during the warm summer months. Since the government and the private laboratories manufactoring hog cholera virus and serum are working day and night to get enough of these materials to immunize hogs and since it is practically impossible, according to the state veterinarian, to get a supply of virus and serum for Emmet county at this time, it is imperative that the farmers use all preventative measures to check the spread of this scourge in the county.

Preventive Measures

"Those who have never seen hog cholera have little or no conception of the awful losses caused yearly or of the unexpectedness of the outbreak. Sanitary surroundings will go a long way to prevent the occurrence of the trouble on farms. Clean out your hog houses. Get fresh lime and give them a thorough whitewashing. Clean the floors well and then sprinkle freshly slacked lime on the floors and around the building. Buy lump lime, make a pile of this lime, using two to three bushels near the hog house and throw just enough water on the lime to start it slacking. After it is thoroughly slacked spread it with a shovel liberally on the floor of the hog house and in the hog yard.

"It would be a good thing to use a commercial disinfectant. Most of the stock dips on the market will be satisfactory if the directions are followed. Do not crowd your hogs. Change the straw in the pens frequently. Burn the old straw that you take out. Feed laxative food. Do not feed meat scraps secured at any market or garbage from any source unless it is thoroughly cooked. Hog cholera virus develops in decaying animal and vegetable material. Furthermore it is strictly against the state laws to feed garbarge to hogs that have not been vaccinated with hog cholera serum and virus. Any farmers doing this should abandon the practice, as they are endangering not only their own herds but those of their neighbors.

"Hog cholera is carried from one farm to another by birds, especially pigeons and sparrows, stray dogs and by sympathetic neighbors. It is a common practice for a farmer who has sick hogs or any sick animals to ask for assistance from his neighbor The virus of hog cholera will be found in the dirt clinging to the shoes and can be carried back to an uninfected herd.

Symptoms of Disease

"Animals fail to come to the trough for feed. Refuse to eat. Have chills and huddle together in the pen and nest to keep warm. They stand with the back arched, the hind feet close together or crossed and the belly tucked up. They resent being disturbed and when they walk they appear weak and stagger and fall. Muscles and joints are stiff and sore. Usually the animals are constipated for a few days and then they develop profuse diahorrea. Frequently a hacking cough develops, but this is not always the case. In the acute form a puslike discharge comes from the eyes. The skin on the underside of the neck and body becomes dark red and the lymph glands in various parts of the carcass are enlarged. The chronic form of high cholera differs from the acute form in that there is more marked evidence of digestive disturbance in the former. Sometimes the hogs will eat fairly well, which gives rise to the idea that the animals are infected with intestinal parasites or rheumatism.

"Farmers are asked to clean up their hog pens as suggested, to watch their hogs carefully and to report to the county agricultural agent any cases where symptoms of the disease appears to be developing. Due to the fact that the hog cholera scourge is making the price of pork pretty high, a little foresight and cooperation on the part of farmers at this time may mean a big saving to them."

THAT'S MA

When mother drives in the family bus,
On the broad highway or the avenue,
She sets up straight at the driving wheel,
With her lips set tight, and her jaws like steel.
And she flies along on an even keel,
That's Ma.

She hogs the road like she owns the earth,
And the men all cuss when she gets in front,
She pays no heed to the crossing stops,
For she has no fear for the traffic cops,
And she swings 'round the curves 'til your head just pops,
That's ma.

She steps on the gas and she lets her go,
With a rattle and a bang where the traffic's thick;
She throws in the clutch, and she toots her horn,
Like Gabriel's trump for the judgment morn,
And she passes all cars with a look of scorn,
That's ma.

Me and dad have to sit in the back,
Cause ma wants room when she puts on speed,
Jeuh ain't got a thing on us,
If you don't believe it just hear dad cuss,
But she keeps on going without no fuss,
That's ma.

'Dad says he ain't goin' to ride no more,
With a women that drives like the very duece;
She'll pile us all in a ditch some day,
And he says there'll be the very d-l to pay,
But she don't care a whoop what he has to say,
That's ma.

If you see a car coming down the street,
Just tearing along to beat the band,
You'll know who it is by a man and a lad,
For one of 'ems me, and the other ones dad,
And the one at the wheel that's driving like mad,
That's ma.

LYDIA of the Pines

by HONORÉ WILLSIE

W.N.U. SERVICE COPYRIGHT by FREDERICK A. STOKES CO.

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

When John did come out she avoided talking to him and he caught her several times looking at him with a sad and puzzled expression. When they started on their usual Sunday walk, Amos went back to the house for his cane and Levine said, abruptly, "Out with it, young Lydia! Been hearing more stories about my wickedness?"

Lydia nodded, miserably.

"My dear," Levine said quietly, "this is a man's game. I'm playing a rough-and-tumble, catch-as-catch-can fight. In it the weak must fall and maybe die. But out of it great good will come to this community. As long as the Indians are here to exploit, this community will be demoralized. I'm using every means, fair or foul, to carry my purpose. Can't you let it go at that?"

Lydia set her teeth. "Yes, I can and I will," she said, as her father came up with his cane.

And though this was more easily said than done and the thought of murdered chiefs and starved babies troubled her occasionally, she did not really worry over it all as much as she might have were she not entering her senior year in the high school.

After the Christmas holidays Margery departed for an eastern finishing school. The night after her departure Kent made his first call on Lydia in many months. The two withdrew to the kitchen to make candy and there Lydia's surprise and pleasure gave way to suspicion. Kent seemed to want to talk for the most part about Margery.

"Hasn't she grown to be a beauty?" he said, beating the fudge briskly.

"She always was beautiful," replied Lydia, "though she's an awful silly. She never reads anything, and she flunked all her Thanksgiving examinations."

"Anybody as pretty as Margery doesn't need to be brilliant," said Kent.

"And she spoons, and you don't think much of girls that spoon," Lydia's cheeks were a deeper pink than usual.

"Shucks, don't be catty, Lydia!" growled Kent.

Kent called several times during the winter, but he never asked Lydia to go to a party nor did any of the other boy friends she saw daily in school—boys with whom she chummed over lessons, who told her their secrets who treated her as a mental equal, yet never asked her to call, or slipped boxes of candy into her desk or asked her into a drug store for a sundae or a hot chocolate.

Nobody resented this state of affairs more than old Lizzie. After Kent's third or fourth call, she said to Lydia: "Kent'll come on here and see you but I notice he don't take you anywhere. If you had fine party clothes and lived on Lake Shore avenue, he'd be bowing and scraping fast enough."

Lydia tossed her head. "I don't care about going to parties."

"You do, too," insisted the old lady. "You're eating your heart out. I know. I was young once."

Amos looked up from his paper. "Lydia's too young to go if they did ask her. But why don't they ask?"

"It's because I'm too poor and I live so far out and I don't spoon," answered Lydia. "I don't care, I tell you." And just to prove that she didn't care, Lydia bowed her face in her hands and began to cry.

A look of real pain crossed Amos' face. He got up hastily and went to Lydia's side.

"Why, my little girl, I thought you were perfectly happy this year. And your clothes look nice to me." He smoothed Lydia's bright hair with his work-scarred hand. "I tell you, I'll borrow some money, by heck, and get you some clothes!"

Lydia raised a startled face. "No! No! I'd rather go in rags than borrow money. We're almost out of debt now, and we'll stay out. Don't borrow, daddy," her voice rising hysterically. "Don't borrow!"

"All right, dearie, all right!" said Amos.

The matter was not mentioned again directly. But the little scene rankled with Amos. A week or so later he said at supper, "Lydia, I'm thinking seriously of moving. I can borrow enough money, I find, to add to the rent we're paying, to rent the old stone house next to Miss Towne's. My idea is to move there just till you finish college. Then we'll go out on a farm. But I'll give you your chance, Lydia."

Lydia hesitated. To move into the house next the Townes would be to arrive, to enter the inner circle, to cease to be a dowd. But—she looked about the familiar rooms.

"Daddy," she said, "would you really want to leave this cottage?"

"I'd just as soon," replied Amos. "Most places are alike to me since your mother's death. I could stand doing without the garden, if I had the farm to look forward to."

"How'd we pay the money back?" asked Lydia.

"After the Levine bill passes," said Amos, "I'll have a section of pines."

Instantly Lydia's sleeping land hunger woke and with it the memory of Charlie's tales. She sat in deep thought.

"Daddy," she said, finally, "we're not going to borrow, and we're not going to move again. What's the use of trying to make a splurge with borrowed money?"

"All right," said Amos, reluctantly. "But remember, you've had your chance and don't feel abused about our poverty."

"I won't," replied Lydia, obediently.

And, to her own surprise, she did feel less bitter about her meager, homemade clothing. She had had a chance to improve it and had resisted the temptation.

Late in March the valedictorian and salutatorian of the class were chosen. The custom was for the teachers to select the ten names that had stood highest for scholarship during the entire four years and to submit these to the pupils of the class, who by popular vote elected from these the valedictorian and the salutatorian.

To her joy and surprise, Lydia's was one of the ten names. So were Olga's and Kent's.

The day on which the election took place was cold and rainy. Amos, plodding home for supper, was astonished to see Lydia flying toward him through the mud a full quarter of a mile from home.

"Daddy, they elected me valedictorian! They did! They did! Olga got four votes and Mamie Aldrich ten and I got sixty-six. Daddy! And Mamie wasn't cross but Olga was. Oh, isn't it wonderful!"

"Valedictorian! My little Lydia! Scholarship and popular vote! I wish your mother was here. I'll write to Levine tonight. He'll have to be here for the exercises."

"And Kent is salutatorian. He won by just two votes. I've got to begin to plan about my dress."

"Now, I'm going to buy that dress, Lydia, if I have to borrow money. You aren't going to begin any talk about earning it."

"Oh, all right," said Lydia, hastily. "You won't have to borrow. White goods is always cheap and I'll get it right away so I can put lots of hard work on it."

"What's your speech going to be about?" asked Amos, as they turned in the gate.

"I haven't had time to think about that. I'll plan it all out while I'm sewing."

Billy did not congratulate Lydia. He passed her just as he had during all the months, with a curt little "Hello." To tell the truth, Lydia was heartily ashamed of herself for her shabby reception of Billy's plea. She knew she had been unkind and she missed the desultory companionship she had had with Billy.

The preparation of the dress went on amazingly well. The speechmaking was less simple. As was customary, Lydia chose the class motto, "Pvelt Amor Patrine," for her subject and sweated inordinately to find something to say. She complained bitterly because during the four years at high school nothing at all was taught about love of country, or patriotism, or anything that would make the motto suggestive.

Amos answered her plaint indignantly. "Well, for heaven's sake! And you a descendant of the Puritans! Lord, what's become of the old stock! No, I won't help you at all. Think it out for yourself."

And think it out Lydia did, sitting on the front steps with her sewing and listening to the sighing of the pine by the gate.

There was but one flaw in Lydia's happiness. Nobody asked her to attend the senior ball that was to take place on graduation night. To be sure, it was not an invitation affair. The class was supposed to attend in a body, but there was, nevertheless, the usual two-ing and only a very few of the girls who had no invitation from boys would go. Lydia, herself, would have cut off her hand rather than appear at her own senior ball without a young man.

Mortified and unhappy, she avoided her mates during the last week of school, fearing the inevitable question, "Who is going to take you, Lyd?"

The tenth dawned a lovely June day. The exercises began at ten and by half-past eight Lydia was buttoned into her pretty little organdie, Lizzie was pulling in her black alpaca and Amos was standing about in his black Sunday suit, which dated back to his early married days. By nine-thirty they had reached the Methodist church and Amos and Lizzie were established in the middle of the front row of the balcony, while Lydia was shivering with fright in the choir-room, where the class was gathered.

Somebody began to play the organ and somebody else, who looked like Miss Towne, shoved Lydia toward the door and she led the long line of her mates into the front pews. A college professor spoke at length, then Kent appeared on the platform.

Good old Kent, even if he wouldn't take Lydia to parties! Kent, with his black eyes and hair, his ruddy skin and broad shoulders, was good to look on and was giving his speech easily and well, but Lydia was seeing him in a red bathing suit as he hung Florence Dondey from a yard arm of the willow. What a dear he had been! Now it all was different. They were grown up. This day marked their growing up and Kent didn't want to take her to parties.

Kent bowed and took his seat. The quartette sang and somebody prodded Lydia smartly in the back. She made her way up to the platform and began to speak automatically.

Amos with tight clenched fists and Lizzie with her lips a thin seam of nervous compression, were swelled with vanity and torn with fear lest she forget her lines.

But John Levine, who had dashed in late and stood unnoticed in the crowd under the gallery listened intently, while he yearned over Lydia's immature beauty like a mother.

"And so," she ended, "when we say good-by, you all must remember that we go out into the world resolved to live up to our motto. That we believe with our forefathers that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. That all men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. And that because the New England people in the Middle West are far from the cradle of liberty where these ideas were born, living among foreigners it behooves the members of our class to carry our motto into their daily life. Love of country leads us, and so farewell!"

It was a foolish, sentimental little speech with one or two real thoughts in it and John Levine smiled even while the tears filled his eyes. He told himself that no one, least of all probably Lydia herself, realized the cynical application of the class motto to Lake City conditions.

The diplomas were distributed. The great morning was over.

After dinner Amos rushed back to the factory. Lydia hung the graduation gown away in her closet and she and Adam spent the afternoon on the lake shore, where the delicate splendor and perfume of June endeavored in vain to prove to Lydia that the senior ball was of no consequence.

Good Elimination Is Essential to Good Health.

THE kidneys are the blood filters. If they fail to function properly there is apt to be retention of toxic poisons in the blood. A dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches, headaches, and dizziness are symptoms of this condition. Further evidence of improper kidney function is often found in burning or scanty passage of secretions. Each year more and more people are learning the value of Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, in this condition. Scarcely a nook or hamlet anywhere but has many enthusiastic users. Ask your neighbor!

Rides on Rubber Drives thru Rubber

"Smoother and quieter than any car I have ever driven"—

—such is the verdict of owners of the Greater Oakland Six, with Rubber-Silenced Chassis.

A vital reason for its velvety performance is a new and exclusive engineering principle—

—the Oakland Six engine rides on rubber and drives through rubber.

Rubber engine supports absorb any vibration in the frame due to torque reaction of the engine, while a rubber-silenced drive erases all body rumbles and vibrations from the rear wheels, drive shaft and transmission.

INTELLECTUAL FREEDOM FOR TEACHERS

There has been formed in New York a committee of one hundred with the slogan, "Intellectual Freedom for Teachers." This committee was organized to protest against the action of the Board of Superintendents because certain teachers have not been promoted, and it is asserted that the failure to promote has been due to their radical views. The committee pledges itself to acquaint the public with the situation which they say threatens every teacher who dare to act on the principle of the right to hold opinions, etc., etc., etc. It would be interesting to find out how the intellectual freedom of the teachers is to be served by compelling them to join with organizations many of which seek deliberately to distroy the Republic. These ladies and gentlemen insist that teachers must have the right "to hold opinions." No one object to their holding any opinions they may please, but there is a decided objection to having them express these opinions in the classroom and teach children doctrines flatly antagonistic to the Constitution of the United States, which is supported by the taxpayers who pay the teachers their salary. There is nothing to prevent these teachers from resigning and seeking a larger audience in public halls if the promulgation of their opinions is in their mind the important job. School is supposed to teach children the fundamental principles of love of country. Until we oppose its institutions we have no right to pay taxpayers' money to men and women who propose to promote ideas destructive of them. Intellectual freedom among teachers does not mean that they shall be permitted to go beyond the curriculum and teach what they please. It would be exactly the same thing if they were to teach things which would be destructive of the spiritual life of the children. It is to be noted that on this committee are several labor leaders and a large number of gentlemen who are Socialists of some stripe, color or character.

NO REDUCTION LIKELY

There has been considerable talk as to the possibility of a reduction in the income taxes at the coming short session. It is highly improbable. Secretary Mellon is opposed to any further revision at this time, and since his party appears to have control in the House and Senate, it is improbable that any measure of reduction will be reported by the committee. The corporation tax for the income of 1925 was increase from 12½ per cent to 13 per cent and by the bill for succeeding years placed at 13½ per cent. It is quite possible that this corporation tax as it appears in the present Revenue Bill may be reduced to the old figure of 12½ per cent, thus cutting off 1 per on the corporation tax for the income of 1926. This is a suggestion from certain quarters, but whether it will go into effect cannot yet be determined. It would seem logical since the increase in the corporation tax was made for the primary purpose of offsetting the loss of other taxes and maintaining a sufficient amount of revenue. Now that the revenue has been shown to be well in excess of what is required, this feature of the bill may be changed.

ELECTION RESULTS

Now that the election is over, the citizen who has done his duty by voting must feel a certain amount of satisfaction. The result of the election is viewed by each individual from a different angle. The fundamental point of view should be whether it will help to maintain, first, the basic prosperity of the country, and second, how it will influence us as individuals. The point may well be raised as to whether any election has a material influence on prosperity. Ordinarily the answer to this question would be in the negative since economic laws, rather than legislation, are of vital consequence. However, should there have been elected a preponderance of radicals that part of prosperity which is psychological would be materially affected. Distrust will cause a contraction in industrial activities which may not be warranted by the actual economic situation. There is no likelihood of any legislation in the short session of Congress which would be inimical to business. The new Congress will not convene, except it is called in special session, until the first Monday in December, 1927, and a survey of the 70th Congress, as shown in the returns to date, would indicate that whatever changes have been made, there is no reason for conservative business men to fear trouble. Both great parties are at the present moment fundamentally conservative.

UNITED STATES MARINE BAND MEETS UNION RESTRICTIONS

One of the organizations of which this country is very proud is the United States Marine Band, which is known all over the world as "The President's Own." Recently, when the band went to Chicago, no city official met them, although a reception had been planned. The reason for this was that the Musicians' Union of Chicago had issued a decree that there should be no parade, that the mayor should not greet the distinguished Marines, that none of the members of the band should appear on the street in uniform, and at no time should these men wear their uniforms save at the concerts. But, even further, it was decreed by by the Musicians' Union of Chicago that no more than two of the members of this band could ride in the same vehicle. Remember this was not in Soviet Russia, but in Chicago, Illinois. Let us imagine ourselves being compelled to submit to the tender mercies of these autocrats of labor and figure out which would be more acceptable, the real tyranny of Soviet Communism or the worse tyranny of labor union leaders.

WHERE THE MONEY GOES

(By. Edgar A. Guest)

He wondered where his money went
And how his kindly gift was spent.
He'd never followed, day by day.
The dollars which he gave away.
And so they said: "Let's trace them down
And go with them about the town."

They led him to a crippled child
Who looked at him and bravely smiled,
He gazed on doctors kind and wise
Restoring sight to little eyes.
He saw health start to glow again
On faces that were white with pain.

A brave boy stepped across the floor who had not walked alone before.
In haunts of misery and strife
He saw the dawn of happier life.
"But few of these," said they, "would live
"If men like you refuse to give.
"If but one crippled child should smile
"You'd count your sacrifice worth while."
When asked to give, recall these scenes
And understand what giving means.

A NEW FAITH

We need a broader, firmer, deeper faith in the people—a faith that men desire to do right, that the commonwealth is founded upon a righteousness which will endure a reconstructed faith that the final approval of the people is given, not to demagogues, slavishly pandering to their selfishness, merchandising with the clamor of the hour, but to statesmen, ministering to their welfare, representing their deep, silent, abiding convictions.—Calvin Coolidge.

PROGRESSIVE RED CROSS CAMPAIGN FOR HEALTH

Public Health Nursing, Nutrition and Home Hygiene Work Cover the Country.

Important contributions to public health were made by the American Red Cross through its Public Health Nursing Service, Nutrition Service, and in instruction in Home Hygiene and Care of the Sick. In every State and Alaska, with the exception of Delaware and Nevada, instruction was given by the Red Cross, also in the Philippines, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Virgin Islands. A total of 57,370 women and girls learned to make a hygienic home, and care for the sick in their homes.

The United States Public Health Service estimates that adequate rural health nursing service would cost $25,000,000 annually, but would save a billion dollars in value of human life, earning power, and economic conservation. The American Red Cross, through its Public Health Nurses, of whom there were nearly 500 on duty the past year, is doing its part in meeting this requirement.

The Red Cross, through its Nutrition Service, taught thousands what to eat for health. In this country, 24 States were served with from one to ten Red Cross Chapter nutrition programs in each State. In 38 States, nutrition instruction was given either through the regular nutrition instructors or through volunteer dietitians.

During the school year an average of 15,413 individuals a month, including parents, teachers, pre-school, and school children were assisted to a better knowledge of food in its relation to health, and how to apply it to their daily lives. In March, 111,219 individuals received this instruction, while during the year 3,588 classes were conducted and 6,450 conferences and home visits were given by nutritionists, thus reaching thousands of individuals.

The Annual Roll Call for Membership from November 11 to 25 is an invitation to all persons to assist in maintenance of such services through another year by enrolling in the American Red Cross.

Tom Meggison of Traverse City and son, Harold of this city, and Kenneth A. Usher returned Monday from a ten day hunting trip on the East Two Heart river, north of Newberry. Ken was the only one in the party to fill his license, bring home a nice 6-point buck.

Word comes from Dr. W. W. Mitchell that he has decided to make his winter headquarters at Miami Beach, Florida, and is now nicely settled at 612 15th street, Apt. 2. Dr. says they made the trip in fine shape and that the family are well and enjoying the warm southern climate.

The steamship Manitou of the Michigan Transit company has been laid up for the winter at the Manistee lake docks. The Puritan, sister ship of the Manitou, has been in the dock since October 1. Both boats ply between Charlevoix and Chicago and other northern Michigan resorts during the summer months.

ATTRACTIONS FOR THE COMING WEEK

Saturday and Sunday, November 27 and 28

Peter B. Kyne's story "More Pay—Less Work" with Mary Brian, Charles Rogers. "More Pay—Less Work" is a fast moving comedy—drama that ends in a riot of roars. It is centered around his famous character Cappy Ricks. A double knock-out that finishes, a fist fight is another amusing ineident. Tugs collide in the bay and the captains start fighting. Each lands a haymaker and knocks out the other at the same time.

Also comedy; Billy Dolley in "A Dippy Tar."

Wednesday and Thursday, December 1 and 2

Johnny Hines in "Rainbow Riley." Gallons of giggles. Cascades of comedy in Johnny's latest and giggest laugh show! Speedier than "The Speed Spook"! Livelier than "The live wire." Come to the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia—hit the trail of Johnny Hines. He went to the mountains to get a feud story—and it wasn't much of a feud before Johnny got there, it certainly developed after he got there—as for the story, Ah! that's where you come in.

Also "The Hodge Podge" and Fox News.

EARLY HISTORY OF CHARLEVOIX

front for some distance on both sides of the river. Mr. Fox soon after, took up his residence in Charlevoix, a store being opened and the construction of a wharf commenced in 1864. Charlevoix soon became an important wooding station for steamers, and the cutting of wood, here as well as at the Mnnitous, and in the vicinity of Northport, furnished employment for a large number of men. From the first it was seen that the supply must come largely from the shore of Pine Lake. To facilitate transporation, a tug was necessary. Messrs. Fox and Rose, accordingly had one built, a diminutiva craft called the "Commodore Nutt." After the exercise of considerable engineering skill, the deepening of the channel of the river in some of its shallower parts, by the aid of teams and road scrapers, and the expenditure of a large amount of muscular force in towing, the craft was finally gotten into Pine Lake on July 4, 1864.

The very earliest business movement at this point, have appeared in the general sketch of what transpired at the beginning of the village. Coming down to a little later date, various mercantile and other interests became represented here. Many buildings of business were erected to show that pioneers overcome all obstacles. The Fountain City was one of the earliest boarding houses established. In 1867 a larger three story building was erected and the second year following was again enlarged, being made by the proprietor Richard Cooper. This building occupies a most delightful location, overlooking Lake Michigan upon one hand, and Round and Pine Lakes upon the other. Other early building that helped to build up Charlevoix were, the firm of Redington, Nelson and Company, who had established their business here in 1868 which was later purchased by John Nicholls. In 1873 George Crouter opened a small drug store on the north side of the river but was in the following year, removed to Bridge street. The first bakery was established by Henry Newman in 1872 and the first meat market by A. J. McLeod in 1879.

It was during this time, when many families were moving here and settling that Charlevoix enjoyed the brief honor of being the county seat of Emmet county. The records were brought from Little Traverse Bay and court was held in the Atthouse building, located on the north side. The supervisors also met here, but Charlevoix County was organized the following spring and was therefore disconnected from Emmet.

The year 1869 was an important period. Charlevoix county was organized and the village of Charlevoix became the county seat, and in April the Charlevoix Sentinel was established. In the issue of April 24th, that being the first, local happenings were chronicled as followed: The union convention to nominate county officers; the fact that Redington, Nelson and Company were having a tug boat constructed at Buffalo for use on the lakes; Messrs. Fox and Rose's store on the south side of the river was said to be of mammoth proportions and nearly finished. The second story was used as a hall. A Fox and Company were laying a plank road between their store and the dock; Redington, Nelson and Company were laying a plank road between their store and the dock; Redington, Nelson and Company commenced operations with their steam mill the previous week; George Kyes had put a building, the lower story of which was intended for a general store and the second story for a boot and shoe factory; Nelson Ains lie wanted to build an addition to his house as soon as a carpenter could be procured.

Besides the Charlevoix Sentinel there was another newspaper, the Charlevoix Journal published at the village of Charlevoix. It was established by Charles J. Strang, son of the James Strang, leader of the Mormons, and the first number was issued in June, 1883.

It is time that we turn back and notice the efforts made for the moral and educational welfare of the community. While the people have been busy projecting business enterprises and laying the foundation of a business center, other important interests have not been neglected, in fact, both the week day and Sunday school antedate the village.

Religious teachings were introduced upon the site of Charlevoix before the village came.

Sunday school work in Charlevoix dates back to the fall when Mr. and Mrs. Dixon organized a class in their log house which stood near the shore of Pine Lake.

It was commenced in the fall of 1859, and closed the summer of 1860, having been keep up with some irregular intermission, between these two dates. Four families were represented—those of S. F. Mason, Medad Thompson, Hugh Miller and J. S. Dixon.

After the close of this Sunday school in the summer of 1860, brought about by the affliction in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Dixon in the loss by death of a little daughter, nothing more was attempted in that line of work till 1865. In the summer of that year Mrs. Dixon again conducted a Sunday school in the little log school house that had been built on a terrsce overlooking Pine Lake, on the grounds now occupied by the Charlevoix summer resort.

In the Spring of 1867 another Sunday school was organized. There were gathered within a radius of two miles sufficient numbers to compose a Bible class and another one for younger people. Rev. Levi Warren, engaged in home missionary work, preached occasionally. Some difficulty was encountered in finding a suitable place for meeting. There was a fisherman's shanty on the south side of the river, on or near the site later occupied by the block in which the Odd Fellow's hall was situated. The shanty was without windows, and was filled with a heterogeneous collection of barrels, nets and other implements of fisheman's art. Permission was obtained from the owner, and the young men of the neighborhood undertook to put it in order. Openings were made in the walls and windows inserted. Seats were made by placing logs of wood on the floor, across which boards were laid.

A union Sunday school was continued until 1880, when the Methodist church and Sunday school was organized and denominational work was inaugurated. When the Congregational society was organized, Sunday school work was also begun in connection with that society.

As soon as the little settlement of Charlevoix was fairly outlined religious activities were fully inaugurated. The first preacher to hold preaching service was one by the name of Calkins who came here occasionally and preached in the old log school house.

In 1867 the first class on the Charlevoix circuit was organized. Charlevoix was made head of a circuit and Rev. J. Gulick was appointed first preacher in charge. He built a parsonage in the woods and worked in the store of A. Fox and Company during the week and preached on Sunday. He served as pastor two years. In the fall of 1869 Rev. A. J. Wheeler came as supply and remained two years. In the fall of 1871 he was succeeded by Rev. Wright Barrett.

A union Sunday school had been and was quite successfully maintained. Rev. James Inwood was local preacher of the Methodist church and did very much toward organizing church work in the village, and frequently preached at this point.

In 1874 steps were taken toward building a house of worship. There was a "bee" of men and teams to haul stone for the foundation. The corner stone was laid August 12, 1872, with appropriate ceremonies, the address being delivered by Rev. J. W. Miller, P. E.

At the annual conference in 1875 Rev. W. L. Tilden was appointed to this charge and remained until the fall of 1877, when he was succeeded by Rev. B. H. Whitman.

In August, 1877, the church building was completed with the exception of seating. The work thus far had been paid for as it progressed and the society escaped the burden of a debt. In October, 1877, the two front windows arrived. They were memorial windows and were presented by Archibald Buttars and M. J. Stockman.

February 17, 1878 the building was dedicated. Rev. Leroy Warren (who was working in the interest of the Congergational Home Missionary Society) held preaching services in Charlevoix during the years 1866-1867.

During 1882 correspondence was kept up with Rev. Warren which culminated in his sending Rev. A. J. Hadley to look up the field. Mr. Hadley found seven persons who signed a call for a council, also requesting that they be organized into a church to be known as the First Congregational Church of Charlevoix, Michigan.

A site for a church building was secured and on the nineteenth of September, 1882, this church was organized by council composed of pastors and laymen from four neighboring churches, assisted by Superinendent Warren. Rev. C. F. Van Auken became their pastor.

The early settlers of Charlevoix village were people who had been taught the value of schools, and at the earliest opportunity we find means provided for educating the children of those who had located in the vicinity. In the fall of 1861 it was decided to build a school house. A "bee" was called and a small log building put up on the bank of Pine Lake about fifteen rods south of where the Belvedere Hotel now stands. It was of cobblestone, just high enough for a person of ordinary height to stand erect without raising the roof. The building was sixteen by eighteen feet. Split basswood logs resting on pegs served as benches.

The first school in this building was taught in the winter of 1861-62 by Mrs. M. J. Stockman, who received a salary of one dollar per week.

In the fall of 1867 it began to be felt that the school house accommodations were too limited. As the legal voters did not seem inclined to move in the matter of building, the women took the affair into their own hands. After consultation, they resolved to hold n fair to raise money as a nucleus for a building fund. The sixth of December was appointed for the gathering.

The fair was a success financially, about $75.00 being realized. This was expended the next year toward building a school house. It was occupied for a three month's summer term of school. It stood near the corner of State and Antrim streets and is now used as a dwelling house.

Early in the year of 1879 the question of obtaining a village charter pressed upon the minds of the people with considerable force, and early in February a public meeting was held to consider the subject. A resolution was adopted to the effect that it was the sense of the meeting that Charlevoix should be incorporated. A committee consisting of Messrs. Buttars, Eaton and Bell were appointed a committee to determine the boundary lines of the proposed incorporation. A petition was forwarded to the legislature, and the bill was passed and approved April 3rd. The act reads as follows:

"That all those tracts of land situated in the township of Charlevoix, in the County of Charlevoix, and State of Michigan, which are known and described as follows, to-wit: Lots numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, and the north half of the southwest quarter of Section 26 and lot numbered 1, and the northeast fraction and the north half of the southeast quarter of Section 27, all in Township 34 North of Range 8 West, be, and the same are hereby constituted a village corporate by the name of the Village of Charlevoix."

The city of Charlevoix, Michigan, the county seat of Charlevoix county, is sixteen miles southwest of Petoskey on Lake Michigan and Pine Lake which are connected by Pine River and Round Lake. The village is best known ns n summer resort; it is built on bluffs and on a series of terraces rising from Round and Pine Lakes, which afford extensive views. There are many attractive residences, which also add beauty to the city.

Charlevoix is an important hardwood, and lumber port, and the principle industries are manufacture of lumber and cement, fishing, especially for lake trout and white fish; the manufacture af rustic and fancy woodwork; and the raising of sugar beets.

Charlevoix is gaining in population year by year and all the indications are that it will soon be known as the leading summer resort of the state. The situation is unexcelled, as have been mentioned. Tho hottest weather elsewhere is not noticeable here owing to the cooling lake breezes and pure wholesome air. The winter temperature is higher than that of many towns in the southern part of the state, and hence as a place of permanent residence or as a business town, Charlevoix is becoming better known year by year.

The harbor at Charlevoix offers attractions to yachtmen not possessed by any other resort in the state, and because of the other means of recreation, we find Charlevoix one of the most attractive places to pass the summer. Three large lake steamers stop at Charlevoix and frequent trains on the Pere Marquette railroad brings the place into immediate communication with all points in the United States through connecting lines.

Bathing, the king of summer pastimes, is well provided for at Charlevoix where long, wide stretches of clean, sandy beach on Lake Michigan and Pine Lake spread invitingly along shores washed with the purest of tempered waters. Here in good company one may disport himself throughout the day, acquiring that sophisticated coat of tan which is "prima facie" evidence of a vacation well spent. In between dips you may watch the coast guardsmen drill with their non-sinkable lifeboat at the near by life-saving station, or visit the government hatchery near the beach where important business such as replenishing the food fish supply of the Great Lakes is carried on by agents of the United States Government.

Being a fishing town of importance, much of the attention of the city's permanent population is devoted to matters nautical. Many of Charlevoix's summer residents who are property holders are the possessors of fine yachts, both power and sail, and several firms and individuals of skill and experience devote themselves to the business of caring for these pleasure crafts during the winter and outfitting them for their owners use in the summer. Several fine vessels have been designed and built in local yards. The Pine Lake Regatta held each year immediately following the cup races attracts large numbers of sailing yachts and motor boats to the harbor and a live local yachting organization insures the comfort and entertainment of their owners and crews.

Horseback riding is another very popular feature of Charlevoix's summer activities, and one which is well provided for by stables of fine, well trained animals imported from the south and west. Horsemen of every taste can find accommodation, whether they prefer the staid and graceful pacings of the sleek hunter or the more exciting gait of the plains-bred pony. There are competent guides for the children and instructors. Many merry youngsters astride the well groomed mounts are a common sight in the bright summer mornings. There are numerous winding glades, which adds to the enjoyment of this ancient and exhilarating exercise, which seems never ta lose its charm for young and old.

Other pastimes may he spent in golfing, on the tennis court, or motoring. Two of the largest and best kept golf courses are found here. They are eighteen-hole courses with distance between holes varying from one hundred eighty-five to five hundred yards, situated an the broad plateau between Pine Lake and Lake Michigan, extending over twelve thousand yards. They are called "The Ekwanok of the West," and no other courses in this region attract so many golfers of note from all parts of the Union. Comfortable and accessible club houses are maintained by both Associations and important tournament plays are a regular summer event, with trophies well worth winning. The tennis courts are unexcelled and kept in condition throughout the season. The most popular matches are probably between women. Belvedere and Inn courts are in sa much demand that a new court is planned far the season of 1927. There are many miles of perfect paved roads. Hence riding comfort is secured. There are many garage facilities which are excellent and there are filling stations and repair shops every few miles. The drive around Pine Lake is in itself an experience never to be forgotten, the roads wind through smiling farm lands, woodland scenes of fairy beauty and the prosperous lumbering and manufacturing towns at the head of the lake.

Johnny Hines Cheats Death in Auto Leap

The next time anyone asks Johnny Hines to drive an automobile it had better not be a 1900 Oldsmobile.

In filming "Rainbow Riley," which comes to the Palace Theatre December 1-2 the script called for Johany to navigate this 25 year old model down a narrow mountain road. Since Johnny can drive anything that has motive power, he didn't hesitate a second to hop into the driver's seat, crank the archaic car and put her into motion.

Everything was lovely until the car hit a steep downgrade and when the comedy star attempted to put on the brakes, the old "horse" not merely refused to stop but accelerated its speed. It careened this way and that until driving it became a most hazardous performance.

In order to save himself, the First National comedy king jumped from the seat and landed without serious injury. No sooner did he do this than the two front wheels of the "old boat" collapsed and rolled over the mountain side to its final resting place 600 feet below.

Fortunately many scenes of the car were taken before its demise. These figure prominently in "Rainbow Riley," an adaptation of "The Cub."

Here Are The Improvements

Review this impressive list of improvements — a notable twelve-months' record of progressive engineering:

- A new five-bearing crankshaft (replacing the three-bearing type).
- A new two-unit starting and lighting system (replacing the single-unit type).
- Air cleaner of improved design.
- Spark and throttle levers placed above the wheel for greater convenience.
- Rumble seat for Sport Roadster.
- Stylish new body lines.
- Rich and attractive new colors.
- Improved all-steel body construction.
- Increased driving vision.
- Indirect dial lighting for De Luxe and Sport types.
- Far greater riding comfort.
- Impressive new smoothness and silence of engine operation.

Greater beauty, greater convenience and remarkable new silence and smoothness of engine operation have followed these vital betterments.

"You're Right, Mary! We Surely Do Need Some New Lanterns!"

MARY objected to so much extra work in keeping old, battered lanterns clean, particularly when nice, shiny new ones would cost so little. John agreed with her when he stopped to think. Besides, he realized that the dented tin sides of these old lanterns had deprived them of much of their former lighting power.

Barring accidents and with good care Dietz lanterns will last a lifetime but few people bother to take such excellent care of lanterns as this.

Doubtless on your farm at this moment there are lanterns that should be replaced with new ones. Don't forget to ask us to show you Dietz "D-Lite" and "Blizzard" Cold Blast Lanterns. They shed more light.

CAPTURE KING BEN AT BENTON HARBOR

Head of House of David Now a Broken Man

King Benjamin Purnell head of the "House of David" of Benton Harbor who has been a fugitive from justice for the past four years was captured early last Wednesday morning at the Benton Harbor colony, by a troupe of state police. He was put under arrest but was later released on $120,000 cash bail, posted by local business men not of the cult.

When King Ben appeared in court the following day he was pale and emaciated, and the once luxuriant whiskers, were thinned and grey. He appeared as though he were out of a dungeon, and admitted that he had hidden indoors for more than a year in the colony hard by the town. He said that before that he had "traveled many miles" but would not give his itinerary.

Four suits are now pending against the King and in each of these cases an accounting is sought by the plaintiffs who are former members of the colony.

HELD ANNUAL THANK OFFERING MEETING

Program, Social Hour and Refreshments Featured Occasion

The annual Thank Offering meeting of the Congregational church, held last Wednesday with Mrs. Shores, was largely attended and a very enjoyable occasion.

Mrs. A. F. Bridge had charge of the program and Miss Adams, Mrs. Mattson and Mrs. Stelter assisted with several musical numbers. Many who could not be present sent their offerings and the total will add materially to the society's accomplishments this year.

Mrs. Cross gave an interesting report of the state meeting recently held at St. Joseph, and stated that the merger had been accomplished and both the home and foreign missionary work of the women through- [illegible] 1st and a [illegible] to cancel all [illegible] time. A Book of Remembrance has been opened at the hotel rooms in which the names of contributors will be entered. It is probable that a part of the Thank offering will be donated for the purpose in memory of members who have passed away during the year.

A social honor followed the program during which light refreshments were served. The December (annual) meeting will be held with Mrs. Bonthron.

SOME "KNOCKING" THEY MUST ADMIT

Came as Response to Request of California Booster Club

The poem, which appears below, was written by a fellow from Arkansas living in southern California, in response to a request of a California Booster Club asking people to write to their friends back home their impressions of the country. It follows:

Oh, come to the land of the western sun,
Where every business is overdone;
Where the stores charge freight on the goods made here.
Ask them the reason and they think you're queer.
They serve you climate with all your meals
It's so blamed hot your back just peels.
The Ananias Club includes the state
From San Diego to the Golden Gate.
The movie stars marry twice a year
Would marry again if the way was clear.
The grapefruit here is something fine—
Cross between a lemon and a pumpkin rind.
Where the cows eat barley instead of hay,
And cream gets lost in the milky way.
They sell you lots that are made by hand,
And make you believe it is really land.
The view of the ocean is very nice;
That is included in the price.
They weigh the sack and then the fruit,
Then weigh them again and their fingers to boot.
They claim it is wet if it rains twice a year,
You get so dry you can not shed a tear.
The chickens have mites, the dogs have fleas,
The desert winds blow and the oranges freeze.
We shovel sand, you shovel snow;
Just about a stand-off, far as I know.
So tune up your flivver and start for the west,
Where jobs are scarce and the pay is less.
Bring all your cash and all your clothes,
When you'll get any more the good Lord knows.
I am telling you this story which I know is true,
As seen by me through eyes of blue.
If the Boosters' Club ever gets this back
They will change my eyes from blue to black.
You asked me to write the truth as a friend;
Now I have done so and this is the end.

FRESHENING BREEZES

Who remembers when not even a cotton-clad ankle showed?

The hubs of the Northwest haven't any kick coming. So far not one of them has been thrown off Queen Marie's train.

What has become of the old-fashioned guy who thought that eighteen dollars was too much to pay for a winter suit?

They hanged a murderer in Chicago the other day. He went broke before they broke his neck.

Only a couple more months and the boys will be making a lot more laws for somebody to break.

Will somebody please set that spike maul up next to our desk. The fellow who is always predicting a long, hard winter is headed in our direction.

—A pioneer is the fellow who can remember when forty dollars a month was considered a white collar job.

In spite of the fact that the boys are all carrying 17-jewel clocks, the engineer down at the works still persists in blowing the seven o'clock whistle.

We may be wrong, but we've got a sneaking notion that a lot of the boys would like to "Tom Johnson" the little old pay envelope along about the first of the month when the bills commence coming through.

Not long now before some wise-cracker will be telling us how many shopping days we've got left before Christmas.

God created a lot of little things in the universe, but let's hope nothing so small they will refuse to give a dollar during "Enrollment Week" to help the little crippled kids

The four-y[illegible] is King Be[illegible] solved. T[illegible] somebody is going to find out who it was that kidnapped Aimee.

Our idea of a pioneer is a fellow who can remember when the hired man thot it the height of opulence to ride to town on Saturday night with the farmer and his wife.

Queen Marie bought five fur coats in Chicago. It can't be her reception was that chilly.

We presume the bootleggers are wondering why Chicago is making such a lot of fuss over a little water.

What has become of the old fashioned farmer who ust to tote the town scribe a little farm produce along about this season of the year?

And Now in Closing—

Buy a dollar membership for the little crippled children this week. If you don't somebody might think you were the guy who went home last Christmas and told the kids Santa Claus had just committed suicide.

STATE TAKES OVER ADDITIONAL LAND

Plan Big Reserve in the Tahquamenon District

The state conservation commission last week gave approval to the plan of the State Park Commission to turn 5,000 acres of land along the Tahquamenon river in Luce county into a state park and game reserve.

The reserve only a part of which is state owned land, contains two large waterfalls.

The commission also passed approval on the proposal to take over 4,700 acres of land in the national forest near East Tawas for a game preserve.

The state and federal government would co-operate in protecting the game in the forest.

COME UP U. S.-31 OR U. S.-131 NOW

NUMBERS OF ALL MICHIGAN ROADS CHANGED

Aim of Federal Government to Serve Traffic to Fullest Extent in Renaming Roads

Simplified directions is one of the big hooms the federal interstate highway system will bring to the recreational interest in Michigan, says Arthur W. Stace, in a recent write-up of Michigan roads published in the Grand Rapids Press.

M-11, the term familiar to us, will he known as U. S.-31; M-14 as U. S.-27; M-10 as U. S.-23 and M-13 as U. S.-131. There will be no road known as the Liley-Hiway, according to the new road dope. East and west roads are changed accordingly.

Mr. Western Michigan Resort Owner in sending out his advertising this coming winter and spring can say to prospective patrons from south, west and east: "Come up U. S. 31 or U. S.131."

Mr. Eastern Michigan can say: "Come up U. S.-23 or U. S.-25," as the case may be.

Mr. Central Michigan can say: "Come up U. S.-27 or U. S.-127."

And Mr. Stockman away out in Nebraska, planning his flights from the heats of his native prairie, sees the directions: "Come up U. S.-31 or 27 or 25 or 23 to the Michigan Playground." He glances at his interstate system map.

"Why, that's easy;" he exclaims. "All I have to do is to take U. S.-30 and follow it until it crosses U. S.-31 or 27 or 25 or 23 and then turn up into Michigan."

And Mr. Corn Rich in Kansas takes a look at the map as he feels the allure of the Michigan waters and forests and hills.

"To reach Michigan I can follow transcontinental road U. S.-40 until it strikes U. S.-31 and 27 in Indiana or 25 and 23 in Ohio," he says. "It's a snap;"

Far down in Floridu Mr. Boomer speculates on a cool, invigorating summer in the northlund.

"U. S.-41 runs from the tip of Florida to Lake Superior at the end of the Keweenaw peninsula in Michigan," he muses. "I can take it all the way or if I want to go into the lower peninsula I can turn on U. S.-25 or U. S.-31 where they cross U. S.-41."

There is just an idea of what the federal interstate highway system means to the tourist industry of Michigan.

Michigan Interstate Routes

Thus U. S. routes 23, 25, 27, 127, 31 and 131 are the interstate north and south highways entering the lower peninsula of Michigan. U. S. routes 10, 12, 112, 16 and 24 are the interstate east and west highways of the lower peninsula.

In the upper peninsula is U. S.-41, U. S.-2, from Ironwood to Sault Ste. Marie, and U. S.-102 from Ishpeming to U. S.-2 at Rapid River.

U. S.-31 is lower Michigan's longest route. It runs from the Straits of Mackinaw to Mobile bay. Even longer is U. S.-41, which starts on the rocky shore of Lake Superior and runs down to the tip of the Florida peninsula, its eventual destination being Miami.

U. S.-31, starting at Mackinac City, comes down present M11 to Petoskey and Traverse City. Just below Traverse City the route divides. U. S.-31 goes on down the Lake Michigan shore, taking the place of M-11 to St. Joseph. U. S.-131, the alternate route and short cut, follows present M-42 to Manton and then comes down M-13 to the Indiana line.

U. S.-31 leaves present M-11 at St. Joseph and replaces M-58 through Niles to the Indinna state line near South Bend. Traffic down U. S.-131 can rejoin it by cutting across through Elkhurt to South Bend via U. S.-20.

LOCAL COUPLE WED THANKSGIVING DAY

Pretty Ceremony Preformed by Rev. Burns of Baptist Church

A pretty wedding was solemnized at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Peter McFnrland at noon last Thursday, November 25th, by Rev. Herman Burns of the Baptist church, when their daughter, Helen Audrey and Robert Allen Howe were united in marriage.

The ceremony was preformed in the presence of immediate relatives of the young couple, who were attended by Miss Mildred Howe, sister of the groom, and Chas. McFarland, the brides brother. Both young people are well and favorably known to a large following of friends in the city, who extend their congratulations.

Elks Memorial Services

Charlevoix members of Petoskey Lodge No. 629, B. P. O. E., should keep in mind the date of the annual memorial services to be held in the temple at Petoskey, Sunday, December 4; starting at 2:30 p. m. From December 1, 1925, to December 1, 1926, seven members have died. The program is a very fitting one.

OPEN BASKETBALL SEASON SATURDAY

BELLAIRE TO MEET LOCAL SQUAD ON OPENING DATE

Five Letter Men Among Eighteen Candidates Out for First Practice Session

With the football season over and the pigskin oiled and stored away, attention at Charlevoix high school has turned to the approaching basketball season.

Coach "Tex" Buchen reports a favorable outlook for this year's squad and has every assurance of a fast team. Eighteen men reported for the first practice session Monday after school among this number being five letter men from last season's outfit. These men are Ted Cooper, Harold Dutcher, Captain George Higman, Hubert McCann and Lyle Beaudoin. With this combination to build around and likely a bunch of new candidates to pick from, the coach is looking forward to a snappy team.

A tentative schedule of ten games has been arranged by Principal Oscar North, who also added that other vacant dates will be filled in as the season progresses. Following is the schedule to date:

Dec. 4—Bellaire here.
Dec. 10—Ellsworth there
Dec. 22—Ellsworth here.
Jan. 14—Bellaire there.
Jan. 28—Pellston there.
Jan. 29—Petoskey there.
Feb. 4—Mancelona here.
Feb. 18—East Jordan here.
Feb. 25—Pellston here.
Mar. 4—East Jordan there.
Mar. 11, 12, 13—Tournament at Petoskey.

Both games with the Ellsworth school have been arranged for boys and girls teams. In connection with this schedule for the varsity, class teams will draw their share of attention as in former years. The school has turned out some excellent class teams in the past few years and the games have been largely attended. Rules have been changed this year so that members of class teams will be eligible for the varsity until they have played two full games on the varsity squad. Last year the rules made members of class teams ineligible for the varsity and resulted in many valuble players sticking to their class squads with the resultant loss to the first team. Miss Thomas will again coach the girls and reports a large number of candidates out for the team. Two games for the girls have been arranged on the schedule and others will likely be added.

The gym at Hooker's garage has been put in the best condition possible, and it is hoped that with the addition of another large stove the heat problem will be solved.

Bellaire will open the local court season here Saturday evening, December 4. Let's turn out and start the season right.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1926

Last day to complete payment of your Christmas Savings Club. The club will then be closed preparatory to mailing checks to members and the opening of our new club. Date of opening to be announced later. Charlevoix State Savings Bank, Charlevoix, Michigan.—Adv. 48t1.

ATTENTION AGAIN CALLED TO SPECIAL ELECTION DEC. 8

Proposition to Bond School District for $225,000.00 Will be Brought Before Voters Again

The citizens of Charlevoix are again reminded of the election at the council rooms next Wednesday, December 8, from 10:00 a. m. to 8:00 p. m., when the question of bonding the school district for $225,000.00 to build a new school building will be submitted to the qualified voters for the second time.

At the election last August many who were in favor of the proposition were so sure it would carry that they did not take the trouble to go to the polls; others who were in favor got tired of waiting during the long discussion and went away without voting; still others who think a new building desirable voted "no" because they did not thoroughly understand the issue. Voters interested in the proposition have had a considerable length of time to look into the matter and talk it over among themselves. It is hoped that all voters interested will poll their vote in favor of the issue next Wednesday.

We believe the majority want a new building with modern equipment and gymnasium. Those with children in school at the present time and with children to become of school age realize the necessity of modern schools and are going to poll their vote in favor of the proposition. Those who have no children in school should be public spirited enough to vote in favor of it as a needed public improvement. It is gratifying to know that the polls will be kept open practically all day, so that people will not feel hurried and will have time to examine the ballots and ask questions.

This time the voters will be asked for a larger bond issue, viz; $225,000.00, which with other available funds will provide sufficient money to erect a building that will house the entire system. The payment of principal and interest will be equalized so that about the same amount will fall due each year. At first the principal payments will be small and the interest payments large, but as the years go by the principal payments will grow larger and interest payments smaller. It will take about $15,000.00 a year for 30 years to pay the bonds under the system proposed, which means an annual tax of less than $5.00 on every $1,000 of assessed valuation.

Your vote is solicited.

STUDIED RADIO SERVICE IN GRAND RAPIDS

Hugh Mayne Will Have Charge of Radio Dept. in Local Store

Hugh Mayne returned last week from Grand Rapids, where he had been studying radio repair work at the Litscher Radiola shop.

Mr. Mayne will now have charge of the radio department of the Charlevoix Hardware company, under whose direction he made the Grand Rapids trip. While there he took an extensive course in radio installation and repair work which will prove valuable in his new work.

REMAINS TAKEN TO CLARE FOR BURIAL

Reuben Dexter Hubel's Death Came Thanksgiving Day

Reuben Dexter Hubel, aged 76 years, a resident of Charlevoix for the past seven years, who lived in the little cottage just south of the C. R. Munyon home, near the cemetery, died Thanksgiving Day, Thursday, November 25, after a brief illness.

Deceased was born in Norage, Canada, April 18, 1851. He came to Michigan with his parents at the age of five years. On June 9, 1870, he was married to Caroline Farnun of Lapeer county. He is survived by one son, Jasper D. Hubel, a daughter, Mrs. C. R. Munyon, both of Charlevoix, four grand children, six great grand children, a sister, Mrs. Byron Munroe of Port Huron, and two brothers, Allie and Harry Hubel, both of Clare, Michigan.

The remains were taken to Cherry Grove cemetery, Clare, and laid beside his deceased wife. The sorrowing members of the family have the sympathy of the entire community.

Some neighbors, if they acted true to their feelings, would swap shots.

HUNTERS ABANDON AUTOS IN WOODS

FEAR FELT FOR SAFETY OF ISOLATED NIMRODS

Storm Wipes Out Roads and Those Who Cannot Sell Leave Autos in Woods

Reports from Sault Ste. Marie state that discouraged remnants of the regiment of hunters who treked into the northern peninsula in search of deer were working their way southward Monday many without automobiles or game.

As the aftermath of one of the most severe storms of the season on the eastern end of the upper peninsulu, which cut off cities in that section from automobile communication, there remained snowbound in Chippewa and Luce counties several hundred automobiles, either abandoned or sold for a small price.

Shipping suffered from the storms that swept from Lake Superior down the river, grounding several steamers. But with the break of the storm all were reported released and under way Monday night.

State ferries at the Straits of Mackinac, tied up over the week end, were able to operate again Monday, allowing stranded hunters their freedom.

Ferry officials estimated that of the 15,000 hunters who invaded the woods but 2,500 were successful in bringing down a deer. The ferry City of Mackinaw and St. Ignace are about to put up for the winter. Ice is forming rapidly in the Straits.

With weather bureau officials predicting a continuation of the snow storm, some apprehension is felt regarding the safety of scores of hunters snowbound in the district. It was estimated that more than 500 hundred hunters were trapped in the sparsely settled district by the storm.

Many parties of Charlevoix hunters had their camps in Luce and Chippewa counties, but broke camp last week and returned home. The depth of snow at that time was nearly two feet and much difficulty experienced in getting out of the woods. The unprecedented weather during deer season this fall according to old-time hunters, will probably result in many using the railroads another year.

HWD. COMPANY MAKES MAIN FLOOR CHANGES

New Display Tables Designed to Aid Buying Public

The Charlevoix Hardware company has recently installed a number of new display tables in their store, designed to make shopping more convenient for customers.

The new tables are arranged through the center of the main floor and display small articles used daily by the housekeeper. Each item has a small space by itself, separated by glass partitions, and is marked by price cards. In this manner small articles and necessities are easily accessible and delays avoided.

The Mary Brewster Circle will hold a baked goods and fancy work sale Saturday, December 18, at Wood Bros. Luncheon will be served at noon.—Adv. 48-t2.

HIGHEST GRADE JERSEY IN STATE

OWNED BY PROMINENT MARION TOWNSHIP FARMER

Bossie Owned by Geo. Meggison Now Holds Record for Milk and Butterfat Production

Shorthorns, a grade Jersey cow, as a result of her splendid record in the Charlevoix County Cow-testing Association, holds the honor of being the highest grade Jersey in the state. However, at least half the honor goes to George Meggison, of Marion township, her owner and the big man behind the gun, for his care, feed and attention was responsible for the noteworthy accomplishment.

This cow at eight years of age had a production of 12,290 lbs. of milk, and 722 lbs. of butterfat with a test of 5.87 per cent in exactly 361 days, or two pounds of fat every day.

She was only milked twice a day and her cow test record shows a net profit of $162.36. Many farmers say they can't afford to feed cows any good alfalfa, silage or grain, but just take a glance at what this cow consumed: 9928 lbs. silage, 915 alfalfa, 3452 lbs. sweet clover hay, 2496 lbs. gr. oats, 52 lbs. harley, 242 gluten 299 lbs. cottonseed meal, 408 lbs. oil meal, 351 lbs. cow chow and spent 122 days on pasture and yet she paid for every dollar of it and made $162.36 as a profit. Six cows like that would make a fairly good income wouldn't they?

She didn't merely happen to be what she is, but rather it can be credited to Mr. Meggison, who for the last fifteen years has always used a high class purebred sire and therefore improved his herd to this high point as the following record in his herd testifies. After glancing through his cow-test herd book for the last three years, his herd has averaged 7,280 lbs. of milk, 393 lbs of butterfat with an average test of 5.39 per cent per cow per year, which is more than double what the average cow produces in this state.

Another interesting thing about his herd is that each year his % test is improving. In 1924 it was 5.2 per cent, in 1925 it increased to 5.4 per cent and in 1926 it advances to 5.55 per cent. This shows what a good, prepotent sire will do in a herd. Probably the best sire Mr. Meggison has ever owned was "Heir of Charlevoix," who was the king of the domnin for over two years and at present is still being used in the county. He has more daughters in the present herd who have been tested during the last year and they collectively have averaged a 6.25 per cent test. Such sires are worth hundreds of dollars to any man, and thanks to the Cow-Testing Association, his worth was discovered before he was sold to the butcher and will continue to advance the dairy industry in this county.

During the last year Mr. Meggison's herd of purebred and grade Jerseys were second highest in the county, with an average butterfat production of 435 lbs. and have proven from this preformance that they do not have to take a back seat for any Jersey herd in Northern Michigan.

This efficient, progressive farmer belongs to the Cow-Testing Association, always uses purebred sires, feeds a balanced ration the year around, and so we say Shorthorn's preformance was not an accident but the result of good dairy management.

What he has done in this short space of time, anyone can do, if you use a good purebred sire and join the Cow-Testing Association to check up on your dairy herd and then use good horse sense. Remember there never has been a crowded condition at the top of the ladder, and why not begin today to improve.

Entertain Thanksgiving Day

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hyek of Charlevoix Route 3 entertained at a one o'clock dinner Thanksgiving Day, and the event was a very enjoyable one to those present. The guests at the Hyek home were Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Struthers and family, Mr. and Mrs. Dan Srigley and John Srigley, all of Hayse township.

No Engine Fumes in Buick Closed Cars!

In the 1927 Buick, the new Vacuum Ventilator pulls engine fumes and gases from the crankcase and ejects them outside the car.

This vital new Buick improvement does away with noxious odors. It adds greater luxury and pleasure to enclosed car operation.

The Vacuum Ventilator serves another very important purpose. With it, crankcase vapors have no opportunity to condense and dilute the oil. Owners of 1927 Buicks are advised to drain their crankcase oil only 4 times during the year.

Next Sunday's special nnnouncements:

"Good Mnnners Before God," sermon at 10:30.

"Brute Fingers," dramatic story sermon, 7:00.

This evening service will be another feature hour of worship and resolution. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis says that "Grent books" are "Life teachers." The dramatic story that forms the illustrative basis for the sermon next Sunday evening will clearly demonstrate this. Which will the world of today choose, "Brute fingers" or the Divine touch? Shall we quietly submit to a "Godless Thanksgiving proclamation?" A great modern book speaks for the best of society. The public is invited to thoughtfully cansider relative values in the pleasant evening service next Sunday. The opening hymns will be sung from the screen, showing artistic representations of the hymn themes.

The Epworth League will observe Epworth Herald Day next Sunday evening. The young people are planning a playlet, followed by light refreshments at five o'clock. The devotional hour is six. All young people are invited.

Next Sunday is church membership day. In the morning service an opportunity will be given for those desiring church reception to be cared for. Baptisms may also be cared for at this service. Arrangements for these privileges should be carefully made with the pastor before Sunday morning.

The Junior church is doing excellent work this year. The pastor expects the Junior pins before Christmas Sunday. Each Junior should wear one.

Answering an insistent demand for a beautiful, well appointed four door, five passenger body on the smooth and nimble Essex chassis, the Sedan is now being shown for the first time.

It has individuality in line, color and fittings. It is unusually comfortable in the seating arrangement. Upholstering is comparable in texture and quality with that used in costliest cars.

No car, regardless of cost, rides any easier. None is more easily handled in traffic. Essex is nimble, quiet and gives unusual gasoline mileage. It has fine car qualities in chassis and body that assure long service.

The cost is but little more than for any four—even less than for some four cylinder closed cars. It is much less than you will pay for any six cylinder Sedan.

WASTING THE TAXPAYER'S MONEY.

Many cities have unofficial bodies seeking to make the tax dollar go farther and change spending practices which are declared to foster extravagance and inefficiency. It is unfortunate that these recommendations fall on the deaf ears of politicians in office. The curse of every American city is the fact that political organizations coming into control seek to perpetuate themselves by spending the public money for useless jobs to provide income for party workers. A second serious trouble is the promotion of unnecessary public works at extravagant prices for favored contractors resulting in very little benefit to the city and much benefit to the political organization in control. What is the use of going into high theories concerning municipal and state extravagance? Political hossism and public indifference are the essential springs from which flow increased taxation and waste of taxpayers' money.

THE FARMER'S INCOME.

Analysis of the agricultural situation indicates that while the average farmer's income in the United States improved during the crop year 1925-1926 by about 4 per cent, the farmer's cost of living during the same period also increased. Returns of the total capital invested in farms in the United States for the crop year 1925-1926 is figured a little more than 5 1-1 per cent. More than one-half of this approximate interest on farm mortgages at higher average interest rates that 5 1-4 per cent. A very complete analysis of the agricultural situation has been made by the National Industrial Conference Board and this analysis is well worth a study. We believe that the most effective way of learning to solve the farmer's problem is close co-operation between farmers and those engaged in industry.

When Boy and Puppy Meet

When boy aod puppy meet, even though it is against the tuberculosis sanatorium rules, there is joy in the hearts of both. And why shouldn't there be joy, especially in the heart of the boy for he is going home soon after a stay in the Ingham couoty tuberculosis saoatorium, and then he can play with puppies to his heart's content. Through the Christmas seals, which floance the work of the Michigan Tuberculosis Association, frail lads are fouod throughout Michigan, and helped to grow into strong aod healthy ones.

MODERN MERCHANDISING.

The reason that shelves nre not loaded down with goods, the renson thnt merchants' money is not tied up with large stocks, the reason that consumers does not hnve to pay extra prices becnuse of the tying up of stocks, the reason why merchadise throughout the country, even in the distnut small town stores, is "up-to-dote"—the reason for all this is simply that the rnilroads now earry goods so quickly that it is no longer necessary tu load up with a season's goods at a time.

GOVERNMENT PENSIONS DECLINE.

A decline in the number of pensioners on the government rolls below the 500,000 mark occurred during October for the first time in 35 years, according to a report made by the Pension Bureau to the secretary of the interior. The report gives the number of pensioners at 499,622 and shows that 1,281 veterans and 1,418 widows of the Civil War died in the month, terminating their pensions.

We're extremely proud of the opportunity given us last week to take a large portion of a well known Manufacturer's surplus stock (created by poor credit risks) of Men's Fine All Wool Suits, at a ridiculously low figure, to sell what we could of them and ship the rest back. Of course they figure there won't be any left (at this low price) to go back, and we think so too, BUT—HERE'S THE POINT—Having these Suits only for a week or ten days, with the privilege of returning them, we're not taking any chances on being "caught with the goods," and therefore can and are going to sell them at a very, very close profit. They were manufactured to sell at $25, $30 and $35, all this season's styles, and we are putting them all in one big group, so you can look to your heart's content and pay only one price.

Miss Phila Armstrong of this city attended the Army-Navy ball and theatre party last Friday evening before the football game with Midshipman Edward Shanahan, also of this city, and reported it a wonderful party. She spent Thanksgiving vacation with her sister in Chicago.

The first rush of hunters to the north land has been struck a "rear-guard" blow by early winter's worst storm, which Monday appeared to have marooned hundreds of automobiles on snowdrifted roadways in the upper peninsula. A fifty-mile wind blew over that section Sunday, driving ships to cover and piling snow in drifts of several feet, paralyzing traffic. Officials at the Soo believe that the bulk of the lower Michigan hunters trapped in the north would be marooned until tractors could blast open a passage. Cars at camps far from main highways will be forced to spend the winter in hibernation.

THANKSGIVING GAME ENDS WITH 6-6 TIE

High School Closes Season by Holding Heavy Independent Eleven

The Thanksgiving football game between Charlevoix high school and the Independents, a team composed of former high school stars, ended in a 6 to 6 tie.

The Independents scored their only touchdown late in the first quarter when a long forward pass, followed an end run by Sharrow, placed the ball in scoring distance. Jones carried the counter over on successive line plunges. Hallett failed to kick goal.

The high school scored their touchdown soon after the beginning of the second quarter after recovering a short punt well into the Independent's territory. Line plunges and end runs carried the ball to the two-yard line, where after three attempts at line plunges, McCann scored on a quarterback sneak. Higman failed to kick goal and the half ended 6 to 6.

End runs carried the plunges, McCann scored on a quarterback sneak. Higman failed to kick goal and the half ended 6 to 6.

The last half was a see-saw with neither having much advantage. The lighter high school team held their heavier opponents in good shape during the last half and the game ended in a tie. A fair crowd attended the game and the city band turned out to furnish music.

1926 Chevrolet's Greatest Year

In 1925 Chevrolet established the automotive world by attaining a yearly production never before reached by any manufacturer of gear-shift automobiles.

Thus, for two years in succession, Chevrolet has broken all previous records and has set a new mark in automotive history.

This splendid achievement results from a steadfast adherence to the fundamental Chevrolet policy of building a product of the highest possible quality to sell at a low price.

That the 1926 Chevrolet has now demand a even greater success—and that Chevrolet has been successful in building such a car—possessing the highest standards of smooth performance, smart appearance, and economical operation—is proved by Chevrolet's success during the year now drawing to a close.

FEEDING MINERALS TO DAIRY CATTLE

This question is of vital importance to the successful dairyman, who wants to make the most money out of his cows this winter. More and more dairy experts are realizing that minerals are of greater importance than we have previously supposed, and day by day we are learning more about them and how to use them.

Briefly the following minerals are discussed:

SALT

Salt furnishes sodium, which is needed in the blood, and chlorine, which is used in making hydrochloric acid for the stomach. Livestock may be allowed free access to salt, or where grain is fed liberally, the salt may be mixed with the grain at the rate of one pound of salt to one hundred pounds of grain mixture. If feeding grain lightly, mix one pound and a half of salt to one hundred pounds of grain. By all means don't be saving on salt.

IODINE

A deficiency of iodine in the ration results in goitre or big neck in calves. Water from certain wells contain sufficient iodine, while in others it does not, which accounts for some farms having this difficulty and others not. Where goitre occurs the thorough mixing of one-tenth pound of finely pulverized sodium iodine or potassium iodine with one hundred pounds of salt and fed to meet the salt requirements is sufficient.

PHOSPHORUS

The mineral element most likely to be deficient in the ration of dairy cattle is phosphoras. Ii is essential for growth, reproduction, and milk production. As a rule roughages are low in phophoras and high protein concentrates are high. Among feeds high in phophorus are bone flour, cottenseed meal, wheat bran, oil meal, and middlings. Feeds low in phophorus are all the hays and straw and common cereals. So therefore, if you are feeding grain that is high in phophoras as the ones listed above probably enough will be available without any additional amount, but if grains low in this element are used, steam bone meal should be added.

DEPRAVED APPETITE

Depraved or preverted appetite is prevalent in certain sections of Michigan. It is manifested by the eating of materials not classed as food, such as bone, wood, hair, sticks, bark of trees, dirt and manure. Growing animals and milking cows are more subject to this condition than others. Cows thus afflicted derrease in milk flow noticeably. This indicates a deficiency in the ration. It may be due to lack of quality in roughage or of phophoras, the latter more not to be true. Depraved appetite in an extreme form rarely occurs where either cottonseed meal, wheat bran, or oil meal are fed liberally, but usually occurs where alfalfa hay, silage and corn and oats are fed. This preverted appetite occurs more frequently in spring and early summer. Where this disorder is prevalent, a mixture of one part of salt and two parts of colorless steamed bone meal should be kept before the animals at all times.

CALCIUM

Calcium is one of the principal mineral elements in the skeleton, fetas and milk. It is usually regarded as the element most likely to be deficient in the ration. This is alsp a symptom of depraved appetite. The following feeds are high in calcium: Bone flour, cow-pea hay, soy-bean hay, clover hay, and alfalfa hay, while other hays, cereal grains, and high protein concentrates are low in calcium. You note that the feeds high in calcium are exactly the reverse in the case of phosphorus.

Skimmed and whole milk are exceptionally good soarces of calcium for young calves. Cows producing less than 10,000 pounds of milk a year and receiving a good quality hay in abundance, do not need a mineral supplement supplying calcium, but it is advisable to add calcium to the ration of high producing cows.

Mineral Supplements furnishing both Calcium and Phophorus

Raw Rock Phosphate

High grade raw rock phosphate contains as much calcium and phosphorus as bone meal and in a much cheaper form. However, results at the M. S. C. Experiment Station, show that steamed bone meal is much superior to raw rock phosphate. In fact the raw rock phosphate had a detrimental effect on the health of the animals. Cows receiving a 1.5 per cent raw rock phosphate ration were inferior in every way to those who received none, therefore this mineral should not be fed to dairy cattle.

Acid Phosphate

It is not be recommended to dairy cattle, until more experimental work is conducted on it.

Raw Bone Meal

Raw bone meal should not be fed to dairy cattle, since it is only heated sufficiently to remove loose flesh and not enough to destroy disease germs, also the odor is objectionable.

Steam Bone Meal

This is not a standard product, but varies greatly in composition, odor, color and palatability. Bone meal having an objectionable odor is not as good for dairy cattle even though it has been properly steamed, as the odorless steamed bone meal. Odorless meal is a superior product made by thoroughly extracting and cooking the bones, then drying. This is a light colored product, palatable, and free from disease germs.

However, steamed bone meal ranks next to the odorless meal, so if using the steamed bone meal, do not discard it, but continue using it until you are able to get the odorless.

Minerals Supplying Calcium Only

Marl

Marl usually carries too many impurities to be used as a source of lime. However, a very high grade marl is probably just as good a source of calcium as ground limestone rock.

Wood Ashes

Wood ashes may be used as a feed, but they do not contain as much calcium as limestone.

Oyster and Clam Shells

Ground oyster and clam shells are usually more expensive than ground limestone and there is no evidence that they are superior for dairy cattle.

Finely Ground Limestone

Finely ground limestone rock is the cheapest form of calcium to feed as a supplement. Poor grads, however, should not be fed since they usually contain impurities.

Complex Mineral Mixture

Many expensive complex mineral mixtures are being fed to dairy cattle. These mixtures usually consist of various combinations of bone meal, calcium carbonate, common salt, copperas, sulphur, glauber salts, potassium iodine, hard wood ashes and charcoal, the theory behind such a mixture of this sort is that if one mineral does not do the work, another will. In the past the belief has been if the mixture did not help it at least did no harm. At our station, however, results with heifers fed a mineral mixture in addition to a basal ration, show that it is very harmful when fed over a long period. The mixture retarded body development and produced an unhealthy appearance. Reproduction was also affected. In fact the cows fed the complex mineral mixture have not yet produced a normal calf. The calves have been born dead or in a weakened condition. Other heifers in same group fed without the mineral mixture have produced normal calves, in every case. At the present time two of the five heifers in the experiment have died. Therefore never feed a mineral mixture to dairy cattle as a part of the daily ration.

Simple Mineral Mixture to Feed

1. For both growing or milking cattle, receiving hay and silage or pasture and little or no grain.

200 lbs. odorless steamed bone meal
100 lbs. salt.

300 lbs. total mix.

Allow free access to this mixtare at all times.

2. For heavy producing cows, receiving a liberal grain ration, silage and legume hay.

140 lbs. odorless steamed bone meal.
100 lbs. finely ground limestone rock.
100 lbs. salt.

340 lbs. total mix

Add three pounds of this mixtare to 100 lbs. of grain in the ration.

3. For growing or milking cattle receiving poor quality of roughage (timothy hay, cereal straw, corn stalks, etc.) silage, and a liberal grain ration.

150 lbs. odorless steamed bone meal.
150 lbs. finely ground limestone rock.
100 lbs. salt.

400 lbs. total mix.

Add four pounds of this mixture to 100 lbs. of grain.

On farms where goitre is prevalent, one-tenth pound of finely pulverized potassium or sodium iodine should be thoroughly mixed with 100 lbs. salt.

Feeding Minerals on Pasture

The pastures of Michigan are usually low in phosphoras. Where pasture is the only feed, heavy producing cows will usually drop in milk production and in some cases depraved appetite follows. Where pasture is supplemented with grain high in phosphoras, no mineral supplement is necessary, but where no grain is fed, bone meal should be mixed with salt at the rate of two parts bone meal to one part salt and the cattle allowed free access.

Well Cured Hay

Properly cured hay or green grass are needed not only for good health but also for normal reproduction.

The hay should be cared so as to preserve the high green color. The feeding of good quality hay will do more to keep up the health of the dairy herd than any other factor. Yellow corn is superior to white corn.

Conclusion

It is a profitable plan to at least feed one or two pounds of either steamed bone meal or the odorless meal to every 100 lbs. of grain ration no matter what your feed is.

If feeding no grain (which is a losing practice) mix 200 lbs. of meal to 100 lbs. salt and allow free access.

For heavy producing animals, feed quantities of steamed bone meal and limestone up to three of four pounds as recommended above.

Red Cross Life-Saving Service Is Nation-Wide

Scarcity of water apparently has no effect on interest in water rescue. Arizona, popularly associated with wide desert stretches and cactus, has gone in with enthusiasm for the Red Cross Life-Saving program.

The building of new irrigation dams is rapidly transforming Arizona into a swimming State despite popular conception of that country.

In more than 800 swimming institutes conducted by the Red Cross the last summer, life-saving instruction was given by the Red Cross.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, 7,145 men, 5,408 women, and 16,713 juniors passed the rigid tests of the Red Cross Life-Saving Service, and were awarded insignia. The total for the year of 29,266 represents an increase of 6,374 over the previous year. The total membership of this corps at the close of the year was 102,076.

The Tenth Annual Roll Call from November 11 to 25 is an opportunity to encourage these efforts through membership in the Red Cross.

INSTRUCTION IN RED CROSS FIRST AID SAFETY FACTOR

Its Industrial and Educational Service Spreads Throughout the United States.

Signs that the United States is awake to the menace of its increasing accident toll are apparent in the growing interest in first aid instruction as set by experts of the American Red Cross.

Approximately 20,000 juniors and adults completed the First Aid course during the fiscal year, passed rigid examinations and received Red Cross First Aid certificates. This represents an increase of 3,500 over the preceding year, and this gain is attributed to the emphasis on health education by various public bodies including not alone the American Red Cross and Government agencies, but life and accident insurance companies, and athletic and recreational groups.

In Dallas, Texas, playground supervisors are required to hold First Aid certificates. In many high schools the subject is included in the regular curriculum in order to assist in training instructors for this phase of the work, special courses have been conducted in the summer schools of such leading institutions as the University of Maryland and the University of Virginia. Instruction was continued during the year at Loyola University, New Orleans; University of California, San Francisco; University of Kentucky; Temple University, Philadelphia; Peabody Teachers' College and similar educational centers.

Work with the public utilities group has shown an exceptional increase during the year. Classes conducted by fourteen of the associated Bell Telephone companies were continued with increased interest and a number of the companies sponsored intensive courses in First Aid for instructors.

The First Aid Instruction Car of the Red Cross was busy throughout the year. In the 123 cities visited by the car 900 meetings were held with an aggregate attendance of 94,000 persons.

Membership of the people in the American Red Cross makes such services possible, the annual opportunity of pledging support through membership being offered in the Roll Call from November 11 to 25 this year.

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

After the supper dishes were washed she sat on the steps in the dusk with Adam's head in her lap when a carriage rolled up to the gate. A moment came swiftly up the path. Lydia with a gasp recognized Billy Norton. Billy wearing a dress suit and carrying a bouquet of flowers!

"Good evening, Lydia," he said calmly. "Will you go to the senior ball with me?"

Lydia was too much overcome for speech. She never before had seen a man in a dress suit. It made of Billy a man of the world. Where was the country boy she had snubbed?

"Here are some flowers I hope you'll wear," Billy went on, formally. "Would you mind hurrying? It's pretty late."

"Oh, Billy!" breathed Lydia, at last. "Aren't you an angel!"

In half an hour the two were seated in the carriage, an actual, party-going, city thing, and bumping gayly on the way to the ball.

Lydia's first dancing party! Lydia's first—man escort and he wearing a dress suit and there were only two others in the hall! Who would attempt to describe the joy of that evening? Who would have recognized Billy, the farmer, in the cool blond person who calmly appropriated Lydia's card, taking half the dances for himself and parceling out the rest grudgingly and discriminatingly.

For three hours, Lydia spun through a golden haze of melody and rhythm. Into three hours she crammed all the joy, all the thrill, that she had dreamed of through her lonely girlhood. At half after eleven she was waltzing with Billy.

"We must leave now, Lydia," he said. "I promised your father I'd have you home by midnight. I want to get a stand-in with your dad because I want to take you to more parties."

"Oh, Billy! Do you?" breathed Lydia. "Well, I don't think there's any one in the world has nicer things happen to them than I do! Oh, Billy, just this waltz!"

At the end, Lydia looked up with a wondering smile. "I didn't know any one could be so perfectly happy, Billy. I shall always remember that of you—you gave me my happiest moment."

On the way home in the bumping buck, Billy seemed to relax. "Well, did I give you a good time, miss, or didn't I? Could Kent or Gustus have done better?"

"Billy," said Lydia, "last summer I was just a silly little girl. Now, I'm grown up. You were the swellest person at the ball tonight. You just wait till I tell your mother about it."

Billy went up the path with Lydia to the steps and held her hand a moment in silence after he said, "It's a wonderful night!"

A wonderful night, indeed! The moon hung low over the lake and the fragrance of late lilac and of linden blooms enveloped them. Youth and June moonlight and silence! A wonderful night indeed!

"You are very sweet, Lydia," whispered the young man. He laid his cheek for a moment against her hand, then turned quickly away.

CHAPTER XIII

The Indian Celebration

It was three or four days later that news came that the Levine bill had passed. It was a compromise bill as John had intimated it would be to the half breeds in the woods. Only the mixed bloods could sell their lands. Nevertheless there was great rejoicing in Lake City. Plans were begun immediately for a Fourth of July celebration upon the reservation. Kent to his lasting regret missed the celebration. Immediately after school closed he had gone into Levine's office and had been sent to inspect Levine's holdings in the northern part of the state.

Levine returned the last week in June and took charge of the preparations. Amos, who never had been on the reservation, planned to go and Levine rented an automobile and invited Lydia, Amos, Billy Norton and Lizzie to accompany him.

As they neared the reservation John halted the car.

On all sides but one were pine woods. The one side was bordered by a little lake motionless under the July sun. On the edge of the pines were set dozens of tents and birch-bark wickiups. In the center of the meadow was a huge flagpole from which drooped the Stars and Stripes.

Already the meadow was liberally dotted with sightseers of whom there seemed to be as many Indians as whites.

"Isn't it great!" cried Lydia. "What do we do first?"

"Well," said Levine, "I'm free until three o'clock, when the speeches begin. There'll be all sorts of Indian games going until then."

"This is just a celebration and nothing else, John, isn't it?" asked Amos.

"That's all," replied Levine. "We thought it was a good way to jolly the Indians. At the same time it gave folks a reason for coming up here and seeing what we were fighting for and, last and not least, it was the Indian agent's chance to come gracefully over on our side. He's done more of the actual work of getting the celebration going than I have."

"I wonder why?" asked Billy, suddenly.

"All there is left for him to do," said Levine. "Lydia, before the speeches begin, go up in the pines and choose your tract. I'll buy it for you."

"The whole thing's wrong," muttered Billy.

Levine gave him a quick look, then smiled a little cynically. "You'd better go along with Lydia and take a look at the pines," he suggested.

"I'd like to look at the pines again," said Lydia. "Come along, Billy."

They entered the woods in silence and followed a sun-flecked aisle until the sound of the celebration was muffled.

Billy leaned against one of the great tree trunks and stared thoughtfully about him.

"I'm all mixed up, Lydia," he said. "It's all wrong. I know the things Levine and the rest are doing to get this land are wrong, and yet I don't see how they can be stopped. I came up here last month to see how bad off the Indians were. And I saw the poor starving, diseased brutes and I cursed by white breed. And yet, Lyd, I saw a tract of pine up to the middle of the reservation that I'd sell my soul to own!"

There was understanding in Lydia's eyes. "Oh, the pines are wonderful," she exclaimed. "If one could only keep them forever! And I suppose that's the way the Indians feel about them, too!"

"It's all wrong," muttered Billy. "It's all wrong, and yet," more firmly, "the reservation is doomed and if we don't take some of it, Lydia, we'll not be helping the Indians—but just being foolish."

"To have it and hold it for your children's children," exclaimed Lydia, passionately. "You and yours to live on it forever. And yet, I'd see a dead Indian baby and starving squaws behind every tree. I know I would."

"I tell you what I'm going to do," said Billy, doggedly. "I'm going to get hold of that tract. I'm not going to deceive myself that it's all anything but a rotten thieving game we whites are playing, but I'm going to it, anyhow. I'll pay for it, somehow, and I'll go on doing what I can to see that the Indians get what's left of a decent deal."

The two listened to the wind in the pines, then Lydia said, "We must get back for the speeches."

Levine had just finished his speech when Billy and Lydia got within hearing, and he introduced State Senator James Farwell as the chief speaker of the day. His audience, standing in the burning sun, was restless. The Indians understanding little that was said, were motionless, but the whites drifted about, talked in undertones and applauded only when as a fitting peak to all the efforts of the ages toward freedom, Farwell placed the present freeing of the Indians from the reservation.

"The fool!" said Billy to Lydia, as Farwell finally began to bow himself off the platform.

Levine rose and began, "Ladies and gentlemen, this ends our program. We thank—"

He was interrupted here by applause from the Indians. Looking around he saw Charlie Jackson leading forward old Chief Wolf.

"Chief Wolf wants to say a few words," cried Charlie.

"The program is closed," called Levine loudly.

There was a threat in Charlie's voice. "He is going to speak!" And there was a threat in the Indian voices that answered from the audience, "Let speak! Let speak."

Levine conferred hastily with Farwell and the Indian agent, then the three with manifest reluctance stood back and Charlie led the old Indian to the foot of the platform.

Old Wolf was half blind with trachoma. He was emaciated with sickness and slow starvation. Nevertheless, clad in the headed blankets and eagle feathers of his youth, with his hawk face held high he was a heroic figure of a man.

He held up his right hand and began to speak in a trembling old bass, Charlie's young tenor translating sentence by sentence.

"I come from the wick-iups of my fathers to say one last word to the whites. I have lived too long. I have seen my race change from young men strong and daring as eagles, as thrifty and fat as brown bears, to feeble yellow wolves fit only to lap the carrion thrown them by the whites, and to lie in the sun and die.

"And I say to you whites, you have done this. You swore by your God, in solemn council, that we could keep this reservation forever. With room for all the peoples of the world here, you could not find room for the Indian. You are a race of liars. You are a race of thieves. You have debauched our young men with your women. You have ruined our daughters with your men. You have taken our money. And now you are entering our last home with the hand of desolation. When the enemy enters the abiding place, the dweller is doomed. But I place the curse of the Indian Spirit on you and the land you are stealing. Some day it will be done to you as you have done to us. Some day—"

Levine stepped forward. "Jackson, take that Indian away," he commanded.

An angry murmur came from the Indians in the audience. A murmur that as Levine laid hold of old Wolf's arm, grew to strange calls. There was a surging movement toward the platform. Billy jumped on a box that he had found for a seat for Lydia.

"Charlie!" he roared, "Charlie! Remember there are women and children in this crowd!"

"What do I care for your women and children?" shouted Charlie.

Then his glance fell on Lydia's golden head. She waved her hand to him beseechingly. Charlie hesitated for a moment, then spoke loudly to Indian to the crowd, and led old Wolf from the platform. The movement forward of the Indians ceased. The whites moved out of the crowd and for a moment there was a complete segregation of Indians and whites.

Billy got down from his box with a sigh of relief. "That might have been an ugly moment," he said, "if Charlie hadn't seen you."

The noise of hawkers began again, but something had gone out of the celebration. The Indians stood about in groups, talking, Charlie and Chief Wolf the center always of the largest group.

Amos and John joined Billy and Lydia at the machine. "The war dancing begins at sundown," said Levine. "I told the Indian agent 'twas a risk to let them go on, after this episode. But he laughs at me. I don't like the look of things, though. I don't know but what I'd better get you folks home."

"I don't think Charlie Jackson would stand for any violence," said Billy.

"I don't know about that," Levine spoke thoughtfully. "He's left Doc Fulton and is living on the reservation again. They always revert."

"Listen! Listen!" cried Lydia.

There was a red glow behind the clouds low in the west. From the foot of the flagpole came a peculiar beat of drum. A white man beat a drum to carry one Indian can beat a drum to carry one's soul back to the sacrifice of blood upon a stony altar. This drum beat "magicked" Lydia and Billy. It was more than a tocsin, more than a dance rhythm, more than the spring call. They hurried to the roped-off circle round the flagpole, followed by John and Amos.

Into the ring, in all the multi-colored glory of heads and paint, swung a dozen moccasined braves. They moved in a step impossible to describe—a step grave, rhythmic, lilting, now slow, three beats to a step, now swift, three steps to a beat. Old chiefs, half blind with trachoma, scarred with scrofula and decrepit with starvation; young bucks, fresh and still strong, danced side by side, turned by the alchemy of the drum into like things, young and vivid as dawn.

Lydia shivered with excitement. Billy pulled her arm through his.

"I don't like this," he muttered. "I don't believe they mean any harm," said Lydia. "Lots of the whites started home before sunset, anyhow."

"I wish you had," replied Billy. "Gee, here it comes."

The chant suddenly changed to a yell. The drum beat quickened, and the great circle of dancing Indians broke and charged the crowd of whites. A number of them drew revolvers and began firing them into the air. Others drew taut the great bows they carried. The whites plunged backward precipitately.

"Kill 'em whites!" shrieked the squaws.

"Run 'em whites off our reservation!" shouted half a dozen young bucks.

Lydia was trembling but cool. "Good for them! Oh, Billy, good for them!" she exclaimed.

Thus far the whites had taken the proceedings as a joke. Then a white woman screamed—

"Run! It's a massacre!"

"Massacre" is a horrifying word to use to whites in an Indian country. Men and women both took up the cry—

"It's a massacre! Run!"

And the great crowd bolted.

Like pursuing wolves, the Indians followed, beating the laggards with their bows, shouting exultantly. Billy caught Lydia round the waist and held her in front of him as well as he could.

Then Lydia heard Billy's voice in her ear. "If this isn't stopped, it will be a massacre. We've got to find Charlie Jackson. He caught a screaming squaw by the arm.

"Susie, where's Charlie Jackson?"

She jerked her thumb back toward the flagpole and twisted away.

"All right! Now we'll make for the pole, Lydia, get behind me and put your arms round my waist. Hang on, for heaven's sake."

Lydia did hang on for a few moments. But the flight was now developing into a free-for-all fight. And before she knew just how it happened, Lydia had fallen and feet surged over her.

She buried her face in her arms. It seemed an age to her before Billy had snatched her to her feet. In reality she was not down for more than two minutes. Billy swung her against his chest with one arm and swung out with his other, shouting at Indians and whites alike.

"You d—d beasts! You dirty d—d beasts."

Lydia, bruised and shaken, clung to him breathlessly, then cried, "Go ahead, Billy!"

He glanced down at her and saw a streak of blood on her forehead. His face worked and he began to sob and curse like a madman.

Too Much "Acid?"

Excess Uric Acid Gives Rise to Many Unpleasant Troubles.

AUTHORITIES agree that an excess of uric acid is primarily due to faulty kidney action. Retention of this toxic material often makes its presence felt by sore, painful joints, a tired, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backache and headache. That the kidneys are not functioning right is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Thousands assist their kidneys at such times by the use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Doan's are recommended by many local people. Ask your neighbor!

Belle Beonett io Mother Role

The list of famous screen mothers is notably enriched by the release of Robert T. Kane's First National production, "The Reckless Lady," with Belle Bennett in the title role.

This is the second important recent instance in which Miss Bennett has essayed a mother role, the other being in "Stalla Dallas." Coincidentally, Lois Moran plays the daughter to Miss Bennett'a mother in both of these pictures.

Other famous mothers of the screen includo Mary Carr, Mme. Nazimova and Vera Gordon. Miss Gordon, who played the mother role in "Humoresque," a production of several years back, was one of Miss Bennett's constant visitors at the First National studio during the filming of "The Reckless Lady," at the Palace Theatre, December 8 and 9.

SKIDDING AUTO CLAIMS A VICTIM

George Pray Meets Instant Death oo M-11 Hill.

Slippery pavement and accompanying sleet and ice claimed another victim nbout 9:30 a. m., Tuesday, when George Pray of Traverse City was instantly killed on M-11, between Torch Lake Village and Keewadin.

According to information received Pray was headed north to attend to business matters. He had reached a point opposite Mud lake, where there is a steep hill. He broke over the hill at a speed of not over 25 miles and hour, then skidded and started to slide down hill.

Going south was the big Reo bus that runs between Petoskey and Traverse City. The bus driver saw the car coming and pulled to the extreme left side of the road. The Chevrolet sedan driven by Pray careen down the hill, hitting the bus on its downward slide, then slid across the road into the fence. Pray was thrown out, striking a post, then falling onto the fence, breaking off both top boards. When picked up it was found his skull was crushed above the ear and otherwise smashed up.

Eye witnesses to the accident say neither of the cars were being driven over 25 miles an hour, and that no blame could he attached to the driver of the bus.

GOOD ROADS ADVOCATE NOW AT WORK IN FLORIDA

Still Boosting for Concrete Road Around Lake Charlevoix and Says We Can Get It

Here we have a letter from "Uncle" George Van Pelt, Charlevoix's pioneer good rond advocate, who is spending the winter in Port Orange, Floridn, where he continues to preach the gospel of concrete roads and fireproof hotels. He calls this communication "A left over of the summer enmpaign,, and it deals with the proposed plan for a concrete road around Lake Charlevoix. His letter follows:

"I am glad to see the increased interest which is being taken in the concrete road around Lake Charlevoix. When asked "Do you really think that we can get it?" my reply is: "Yes, if we want it," but we cannot get anything we want without first mnking known our wants—then working for it. If it is right that this road is to be built, there is no power that can prevent our getting it built. But we cannot get it if we do nothing to help it along and if we expect thnt someone else will do it. This is a county job. There is not a single man in Charlevoix county who will not be benefited by the building of this road nround this beautiful lake. So it is up to you. I can't build it alone—neither can you. I must have help, and so must you. But if we all work together, we can get it.

"There is not a person in Charlevoix county who does not know that every foot and every mile of concrete road in their county is still as good and as durable as it was the day it was built. And the best of all is this—they all know thnt it has not cost them a single cent for it's maintenance, or upkeep, as we usually call it.

"Another thing that the people of Charlevoix county know, is that there is not a rod of gravel road with the dirty buack top stuff that has been put on it, that has not had to be repaired before it was a year old.

"Compare the two kinds—concrete and gravel. The only cost of concrete is the first cost. After that nothing. Then compare the other. The first cost is not as much as the continual cost of keeping the road half way passable—and never having a perfect one.

"The things that I combat for on this road question are these: That there is no road built that has the wearing qualities of a good concrete road; none that are as smooth and easy to ride upon; there is no other road on which you can haul the same load weight with the same number of gallon of gasoline as you can on a concrete road; that the first cost is the last cost for a concrete road, consequently it is the best and by far the cheapest. When the bonds fall due the road is an good as when the bonds were issued, and that is more than you can say of any other road.

My experience for 20 years leads me to, and warrrants me in saying these things. It is not that I am being paid for so doing—because I am not. It's because I have the time, and can afford to help my fellow men. These are only a few reasons why the state and the United States have been driven to use the use of, and the necessity for good concrete roads—all of which we cannot afford to ignore.

Yours truly,
"Uncle George."

XMAS SAVING CLUB PLANS TEACH THRIFT

Many Charlevoix residents have been impressed during the past few days of the value of consistent saving. The banks of Charlevoix have mailed out the grist of annual Christmas savings club checks to subscribers of those clubs and the total distribution will amount to a considerable sum. Under the rules of the savings clubs conducted by the banks each member is required to deposit a definite nmount each week, and the checks now being received cannot but serve an impressive evidence of the value in snving even a small sum each week.

The Christmas savings club plan, inaugurated by the banks of the nation but n few years ngo, has been nccepted by n host of people as the means either for forming the nucleus of a permanent bank account or for providing a definite sum of money for their annual Christmas buying. In either instance the cluba are demonstrating annually to thousands of people what can be accomplished through thrift, in either a small way or a big way. The average club member is having it proven to himself that if it is possible to accumulate an impressive sum through mengre weekly savings, it is possible to nccumulate an impressive sum by the practice of thrift nnd ndherence to a refinite plan for saving.

CHRISTIANITY'S MODERN PROGRAM

FACTS FOR CONGREGATIONALISTS TO DWELL UPON

"Every Member Canvass" for Funds Begins Sunday Afternoon, December 12

A great force for the advancement of christianity in America is represented in the Congregational Home Boards.

The income for the missionary and benevolent work of the Home Boards last year amounted to $3,002,687. Receipts from the churches were $1,880,940, the balance coming from special gifts, legacies and endowments.

The Home Boards are included in the missionary and benevolent contributions of the First Congregational church which will take its annual "every member canvass" for funds beginning Sunday afternoon December 12. The total buget of the Charlevoix church is $4,000.00, of which $3,500 is for local expenses and $500.00 is for missions and benevolences, home and foreign.

The Home Missionary Society belongs to the church extension division of the home boards. This division includes also the Sunday school extension society and the church building society. The building society in addition to annual receipts of nearly $300,000, has a circulating loan fund of $560,000 with which to assist in financing new edifices and parsonages.

"Under-privileged" peoples in the nation, especially negroes in the south, Indians, Orientals, southern highlanders, Spanish-speaking residents and Porto Ricans, are helped in their religious and educational development by the American missionary association which forms a second division of the Congregational home boards. The association was founded in 1846, eighty years ago. Its yearly buget amounts to $1,250,000. The association conducts fifty schools and colleges which have nearly 500 teachers and 8,000 pupils. Institutions which it has founded and which

INDEPENDENTS TRIM CEMENT CO.'S TEAM

Win Fast Game 20 to 18 from Petoskey Basketeers

The Charlevoix Independents defeated the fast Petoskey Portland Cement company team here Monday night by the close score of 20 to 18. It was a fast, hard-fought battle throughout and was nobody's game until the final whistle blew.

Hallett and Buchen were the high scorers for the Charlevoix team, while Fettig and Ernst garnered the most tallies for the Petoskey team. Charlevoix promises to give any northern Michigan Independent outfit plenty of action this winter. Buchen, left guard, coaches the local high school teum and is a former Central Normal player; Jones, right guard, Davenport, center, and Hallett, right forward, are all former high school stars, Coleman, left forward, is a fast shifty man nnd a credit to nny team.

TRYING OUT SNOW FENCE

HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT EXPERIMENTING ON M-13

Michigan Officials Believe That More Liberal Use of Fence Means Less Truck Work

North of Kalkaska on Trunk Line 13 the State Highway Department is arranging to conduct a series of experiments with different types of snow fence. Three different types will be used: first a plain type board fence; second, the ordinary slat board fence such as is used by railroads in their snow fence work; and third, the ordinary wooden picket fence. First of all it is decided to know which is the most effective type for use in this work, next the distance to which snow will drift on the leeward side of the fence for the various heights of fence. The most efficient spacing of pickets for the picket type and of the six inch boards for the slat board type will also be investigated.

A complete set of meteorological instruments are being installed so as to be able to find out under what climatic conditions drifting is most prevalent. These instruments include an instrument for measuring wind velocity, recording thermometer, and sunshine recorder. The amount of sunshine, range of temperature, and wind velocity all have their effect on snow drifting, hence it is highly important to be able to predict the approximate amount of drifting liable to occur during the winter in various sections of the State, according to the climatic conditions prevailing in that section.

There is absolutely no literature of any kind on this subject as no experimental work similar to that planned by the Department has ever been done. At the present time snow fence must be set largely by the experience gained from the observations of previous winters. It is quite obvious that a higher fence can probably be set closer to the road than one of the lower type. In places where rights of way are narrow it is highly important that the proper height of fence for the situation be known, as in many instances it is impossible to secure the consent of the property owner for the placing of snow fence in the field adjoining the right of way. The snow fence, then, must be placed on the right of way line and the height and type so chosen that drifts will form between the fence and the roadway.

It is the expectation of engineers in the Department that with a liberal use of snow fence a large amount of work now being handled by heavy tractorplows can be reduced to such an extent that the lighter fast-moving truck plows can keep the roads open. This will not only give much more satisfactory service, but will reduce the cost of snow removal enormously.

REBEKAH CARNIVAL TUESDAY, DEC. 14

Charleston Contest for Children to Be a Big Feature

The Rebekahs are busy in preparation for their annual carnival to be held Tuesday, December 14th.

PETOSKEY MAN ARRESTED ON ARSON CHARGE

Implicated in Fourteen Fires During Past 20 Years

L. G. Grimes, former member of the Petoskey city council and for many years a farmer in the Petoskey region, is under arrest and now held in the county jail, charged with arson with intent to defraud insurance companies and also with having hired other parties to commit arson. Charles Rounds, one of the men alleged to have been hired by Grimes, is also under arrest, and is said to have made a confession implicating both himself and Grimes.

The list of fires on property owned by Grimes includes 14 building and cover a period of 20 years. Secret service operatives and county officials have been working on the case for many months, and according to latest reports, Grimes is said to have confessed to the burning of his home in Petoskey on Janunry 1, 1926, on which he collected insurance to the amount of $6,500.

The numerous fires on Grimes property in the rural district prevented farmers from getting insurance on their holdings.

CHICAGO MALE QUARTET NEXT

WILL APPEAR AT THE PALACE THEATRE DECEMBER 14

Rollicking Fun and Laughter Is Keynote of Program on Next Lecture Course Number

The Chicago Male Quarter, which will be heard here Tuesday evening, December 14, on the Lyceum course, presents one of the most popular forms of amusement ever designed for the entertainment platform. A good male quartet is always a "hit." The Redpath Bureau, through which the Chicago Male Quartet has been secured to come here, states that it receives more requests from the public for male quartets than for any other form of entertainment company.

The Chicago Male Quartet is one of the best in the field. Headed by Robert Herrick, well-known singer and entertainer, the company includes John Sloan, first tenor; Kirk Emmons, second tenor; and Frank Culman, second bass.

Rollicking fun and laughter is the keynote of the program this popular organization presents, although groups of the standard quartet numbers are given splendid rendition. Humorous song sketches, pianologs, and character impersonations are among the numbers presented. Costumed musical sketches are one of the best-liked features of the program.

The atmosphere of the college glee club pervades a part of the entertainment. The gay, happy-go-lucky spirit of college days is embodied in these four young men, all of whom are former college students. They learned the songs they sing on the campus, and they bring to audiences a vivid picture of college life.

Selma Lenhart, monologist, who appeared on the first number of the series of lecture courses November 12, pleased a large and appreciative audience. This popular and splendid variety of entertainments should prove welcome to Charlevoix citizens during winter months. The coming aumber of the series will undoubtedly prove as popular as the first, as the Chicago Male Quartet is an outstanding company with a lively program that always scores a complete "hit."

TRUNK LINES TO BE PLOWED

EXPECT ROTARY PLOW HERE SOME TIME THIS WEEK

Charlevoix-Boyne City and Boyne City-East Jordan Roads Will Be Kept Clear

Extensive plans are now beiag worked out for snow removal on Charlevoix county roads during the present winter, according to Ernest Peaslee of the Road Commissioner's office.

A large rotary plow from the state highway department is expected to arrive here some time this week from Cadillac, and if present plans are carried out will be located at Charlevoix. This plow will operate on M-11 between Bay Shore and Eastport. The county owned plow will make its hendquarters at Boyne City and will operate on trunk line M-57 between Boyne City and Boyne Falls, and on M-13 between Boyne Falls and the junction of M-13 and M-57 near Clarion.

In addition to the two large tractor-plows, two smaller units will be employed after light storms. The county now owns one truck with plow equipment which will be located at Boyne City and work in conjunction with the larger outfit in that end of the county. The commission also contemplates the purchase of another truck and V type plow attachment which will be operated at the Charlevoix end.

Along with the work above mentioned, which will be under state supervision, the county will keep county roads open between Charlevoix and Boyne City and Boyne City and East Jordan. No attempt will be made to keep the Charlevoix-East Jordan road clear of snow on account of the many narrow cuts. It is estimated that the road from Charlevoix to East Jordan may be kept open by the way of Boyne City at less expense than to clear the stretch from Ironton to East Jordan.

This program puts just twice the amount of equipment on the same roads this winter that were kept open by one plow last year, and undoubtedly better results will he obtained. Around two miles of the picket type snow fence will be placed on M-11 between Bay Shore and Eastport, and should keep some of the worst cuts free of snow. Last year the snow removal work of the state highway department in northern Michigan was only in the experimental stage, and department officials believe that with this experience to help them, they will have the situation well in hand this winter.

LET'S MAKE CHRISTMAS A SANE ONE

There are two bits of advice whieb it is folly to ignore in this season. The one is "Do Your Christmas Shopping Early," and "Send Your Christmas Mail Early" is the second. Fools heed neither, but if the observanca of both is proof of rare wisdom then the world is becoming wiser.

It was but a few years ago that the major portion of the Christmas shopping was done during Christmas week and the Christmas rush in the mails did not begin until the eleventh hour. The result was that unfavorable shopping conditions and congested mails ruined Christmas Day for countless thousands.

How much saner and how much more satisfactory for all concerned are the modern practices of starting the gift-buying season the first week in December and starting the gifts through the mails in ample time to insure their punctual delivery.

Early shopping gives one the pick of the new and undepleted Christmas stocks, leisurely selection, more satisfactory service and less jostling. Early mailing is a guarantee of timely delivery and minimizes the dangers of damage and loss in transit.

Should there be any to whom these arguments are unconvincing, let them give a thought to the merchant and his sales force and to the postal employes whose one desire is to please the public, but who are powerless to help those who won't help themselves.

AUTOMOBILE NEWS

Retail deliveries of 4419 new motor cars and trucks by Dodge Brothers dealers in United States and Canada during the week ended November 27 have exceeded all previous weekly records estnblished during the last quarter of any year. Compared with the previous week this year the gain is 37.9 per cent and compared with the corresponding week of 1925 when 2595 cars were sold the gain is 70.3 per cent.

Deliveries during the four weeks of November totaled 14,676 units, a substantial increase over the preceding four weeks of October and a gain of 3,854 units over the corresponding four weeks of November 1925, or 35.6 per cent.

The official figures just released by the United States Department of Commerce showing production of motor cars and trucks in the United States and Canada during the first ten months of this year lend interest to the excellent 1926 records established by Dodge Brothers, Inc.

Total production of motor cars and trucks in the United States and Canada during the first ten months of 1926, was 4,026,879, compared with 3,638,159 during the corresponding month of 1925, a gain of over 10 per cent. From January 1 to November 1 this year Dodge Brothers, Inc., in its plants in United States and Canada has produced and sold 308,641 motor vehicles against 226,848 during the same period last year, a gain of 36.1 per cent. Comparing progress over a longer period Dodge Brothers gain over the first ten months of 1926 is 109.9 per cent; that of the industry, 16 per cent.

"These official records", says Benj. Brown, of the Brown Garage, local dealer, "show that Dodge Brothers gain to date this year is more than three time as great as that of the entire industry and that Dodge Brothers production during three years has grown over six and a half times as much as the total of all American motor car manufactures. I can conceive of no more convincing evidence of the increasing popularity of the present type of car of which Dodge Brothers have built over 1,800,000 in Twelve years."

night a long, shrill cry. He gave it again and again. At each repetition the noise of the mob grew less, and shortly panting, feverish-eyed bucks began to struggle into the light around the pole.

Then, without a word, Billy led Lydia away. The Indians passing them shook their bows at them but they were unmolested.

"Can you walk, Lydia? Do you think you're badly hurt?" asked Billy. "To think of me not scratched and you hurt! Your father ought to horse-whip me!"

"You saved me from being trampled to death!" cried Lydia, indignantly. "Oh, there's the auto."

"Billy," cried Levine, "could you run the car and the two women down the road while Amos and I help the agent get order here? The worst seems to be over, for some reason."

"Billy got Charlie Jackson to call the Indians in," said Lydia.

"I'll wait for you at the willows, a mile below Last Chance," said Billy.

He was an indifferent chauffeur but he reached the willows without mishap.

Sitting with the murmur of the brook and the fragrance of marsh grass enveloping them, the two young people did not talk much.

"Billy," whispered Lydia, "you're so good to me and I was so horrid to you once."

Billy felt her fingers on his knee and instantly the thin little hand was enveloped in his warm fist. "Do you take it all back, Lydia?"

"Well, the horrid part of it, I do," she hedged.

"That's all right," returned the young man. "I'm willing to fight for the rest of it. Don't try to pull your hand away, because I intend to hold it till the folks come. You can't help yourself, so you have no responsibility in the matter."

So for an hour longer they sat, watching the summer night and waiting.

Finally two dim figures approached. "All right, Lydia?" asked Amos.

"Oh, yes! Yes!" she cried. "Are either of you hurt?"

"No," replied Levine. "We got hold of Charlie Jackson about eleven and locked him up, then we felt secure."

"You aren't going to hurt Charlie!" cried Lydia.

"No, but we'll shut him up for a week or so," said Amos.

Levine started the car homeward. They reached home at daylight. The celebration made table talk and newspaper topic for several days. No real attempt was made to punish the Indians. For once, the whites, moved by a sense of tardy and inadequate justice, withheld their hands.

It was just before college opened that Amos announced that he was going to buy the one hundred and twenty acres John had set aside for him.

"How are you going to pay for it?" Lydia asked.

"Don't you worry, I'll tend to that," replied Amos. "John's going to hold it for me, till I can get the plue cut off. That'll pay for the land."

"How much did you pay for it, Mr. Levine?" asked Lydia.

Levine grinned. "I forget!"

Lydia sat with her chin cupped in her palm, her blue eyes on Levine. To the surprise of both men, she said nothing.

After the supper dishes were washed, and Amos was attending to the chickens, Lydia came slowly out to the front steps where Levine was sitting. She leaned her head against his arm and they sat in silence.

"Lydia," said John, finally, "how does the Great Search go on?"

"I don't thing I make much headway," replied Lydia. "The older I grow, the less I understand men and I've always felt as if, if there was a God, He was a man."

"You mean male, rather than female," agreed John. "Lydia, dear, I wish you did have faith."

"But do you believe, - yourself?" urged Lydia.

"Yes. I know that the soul can't die," said the man, quietly. "And the thing that makes me surest is the feeling I have for you. I know that I'll have another chance."

"What do you mean?" asked Lydia wonderingly.

"That, you'll never know," he replied.

"Well, I know that you're a dear," said the young girl, unexpectedly, "no matter how, you get your Indian lands. And I love you to death."

She patted his cheek caressingly and John Levine smiled sadly to himself in the darkness.

• • • • • • •

College life was not much unlike high school life for Lydia. She was very timid at first; suffered agony when called on to recite; reached all her classes as early as possible and sat in a far corner to escape notice. But gradually, among the six thousand students she began to lose her self-consciousness and to feel that, after all, she was only attending a larger high school.

Except for flying visits home, John Levine spent the year at Washington. He was returned to congress practically automatically, at the end of his term. Kent throve mightily as a real estate man. He continued to call on Lydia at irregular intervals in order to boast, she thought, of his real estate acumen and of his correspondence with Margery and Olga, both of whom were now at boarding school.

A Word With the Old Folks

Elderly People Are Learning Importance of Good Elimination.

IN the later years of life there is apt to be a slowing up of the bodily functions. Good elimination, however, is just as essential to the old as to the young. Many old folks have learned the value of Doan's Pills when a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys is required. Scanty or burning passages of kidney secretions are often signs of improper kidney function. In most every community are scores of users and endorsers who acclaim the merit of *Doan's. THE NEW SENATE

According to the final results from the last election the Senate of the 70th Congress, which will come into office on March 4th, but which, unless a special session is called, will not meet until the first Monday in December, 1927, will be composed of 48 Republicans, 47 Democrats and one Farm Labor representative, making a total of 96, which is the full membership of the Senate. Included in the Republican 48 is the Senator to be elected from Maine, where a vncancy exists, but which is assured will result in the return of a Republican senator. It is a curious position for Senator Shipstead because he holds the balance of power between Republicans and Democrats. His vote with the Democrats would give them 48, while his vote with the Republicans would give them control. Included in the Republican 48 are certain members who are generally classed as radicals, including the two senators from Wisconsin and others. However, we are not concerned with the political pregriminations of the radicals, but we are concerned with the hope that we are not again approaching a bloc system of legislation in Congress. It is unfortunate that neither the Republicans nor the Democrats have a distinct and definite majority. The bloc system of legislation has never been a success anywhere and it requires no long memory to recall thnt in France it nearly wrecked the country, certainly helping to wreck its financial structure. It's probable however, thnt there will be very little legislation in Congress either at the short session or the long session aside from necessary supply bills and other imperative legislation. Whether Congress will ignore political considerations and party lines and vote with the single purpose of passing good legislation, remains to be seen.

CHURCH OF GOD

Services to be held nt the chapel on West Hurlburt avenue next Sunday:

Sunday school at 11:45 a. m.

Regular morning service at 10:30 n. m.

Young People's meeting at 6:30 p. m.

Evening service at 7:30 p. m.

Prayer meeting Wednesday evening at 7:30 p. m.

The Sewing Circle will meet at the residence of Mrs. Ed. Snider, in the country, on Tuesday p. m., December 14th. The Circle has made fine progress in the past. They bring in the goods. If we all work with one purpose in mind, we'll all win the goal.

The young people's services are getting better. Come and join in the "scripture hunt." Hear the singing and speakers.

The regular services are getting better. Why not come and make your presence felt with the people of God. We are God's children if we love and serve him in spirit and truth. Say with others: "The Lord being my helper, I will be there."

We will have a Christmas program. All are welcome.

U. P. EDITOR INTRODUCES NEW IDEA

Suggests Building State Ferry from Manistique to Frankfort

Encouruged by the incrensing talk thnt it will be necessary to nddd a third auto ferry to take care of future auto traffic between Mackinnw City and St. Ignnce, the Crystal Falls Diamond Drill editor introduces n new idea that might have a lot of hard, practical common sense wrapped up in it. He proposes thnt the third boat be put on between Frankfort on the lower Michigan side and Menominee on the upper Michigan side. This would lessen to a considerable extent the distance between portions of lower Michignn and the western part of upper Michigan. The charges would necessarily have to be considerable higher as the distance is greater thnn between the two terminals now used. It is natural for us, located as we nre to object to any project that will divert the traffic from our doors, but this tourist traffic will be large enough for all of us, and if this plan contains the merit it seems to have, in the end the tourist traffic is bound to cross the straits at some time or other, and this proposed route may prove another great feeder for northern Michigan's great out-of-door-places. —Cheboygan Democrat.

GOVERNORS TO MEET AT MACKINAC ISLAND

President Coolidge to Preside Over Assembly July 22-24, '27

The Conference of Governors of the United States will be held at Mackinac Island on July 22 to 24, with the Grand Hotel as headquarters. President Coolidge has been invited to address the conference and it is expected that he will accept the invitation extended to him by the committee composed of Governors Brewster, Maine, chairman; Nellie T. Ross, Wyoming; Martin, Florida; Hammill, Iowa; and ex-Governor Hardee, Florida. The committee were received by the president at the White House Saturday.

Many matters will be discussed at the conference, among which will be the delving into election campaign expenditures, based on a resolution introduced at the last conference at Cheyenne, Wyoming, by Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania, and— on agriculture problems.

The conference is expected to be one of the most important sessions of governors since its formation. The program of entertainment while at the Island will be in charge of the Civic Association.

The annual bazaar conducted by the M. E. Literary and Sewing Club, will be held December 10 and 11, in the store of the Charlevoix Hardware Co.—Adv. 48t2.

Mistletoe Wisdom

By Violet Alleyn Storey,
—in Montreal Family Herald

He chanced to spy a bunch of green
That hung above his head,
And then he looked at her askance,
"What is that thing?" he said.
She blushed and shook her learned locks,
And turned her face aside.
"Oh, that is very interesting!"
She rapidly replied,
"The druids used to haut for it
To keep their souls from strife
And sometimes they would cut it down
With silver bladed knife.
And one time Baldir of the Norse,
Or legend tells us so,
Was shot with arrows of it, so
Some fear the mistletoe."
"The Mistletoe? Step out a bit.
I'm not afraid of this.
I'll tell you what I know of it."
He told her with a kiss.

Their Christmas and an Odd Tree

One Surprise Package That Brought Joy to Entire Family.

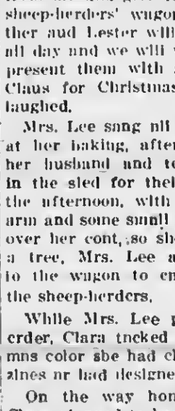
By GERTRUDE WALTON

"IT IS plain to see thnt for this Christmas there will be no tree—I mean one that isn't made from a basket or a table—no real tree. Any kind of a Santa Claus, as well as trees, would die in this terrible place. It would be more bearable if James were home," Mida Lee exclaimed impatiently as she looked lovingly at a photograph of her elder son, James, who, because of government service over the sea, could not spend Christmas with his home circle.

As she looked out over the treeless, snow-covered prairies of her northern ranch home, eighteen miles from town, where the season's drought had robbed them of garden and grain, her sighs rose to an exclaimed exclamation which brought twelve-year-old Clara from an adjoining room to hear the secret her mother revealed.

"Let us have our tree and Santa Claus first," Mr. Lee said, when he heard of the plan of a "mistletree" and a boy-Santa Claus. Of course, everyone was willing. So the packages, some of which had been brought that day from town, were being fastened over Mr. Lee as the tree, when he said, mischievously winking at Lester, "Please don't forget the large package I just brought for all of you. It is in the closet."

Mrs. Lee and Clara ran excitedly to the closet when a package—a tall boy—seized them both in his arms. Through smothered joy-cries of "James! When did you come?" Mr. Lee explained that on a previous visit to town he had received word that James was coming home for Christmas. He kept the secret as a happy surprise from Mrs. Lee and Clara. Upon pretense of getting some gifts for the children, he and Lester had planned the trip to town after James, who was now hungry and ready for supper.



"May I serve as your tree this year, with branches I hope strong enough to hold all the real affection you place in me, as well as to hold my packages of love and service the real Santa Claus allows me to carry to his children everywhere? Again I hope that I may be a worthy Santa Claus—His Santa Claus—to distribute His peace and good will," James said as he learned of the afternoon visit to the sheep-herders' wagon.

Insurance of Yield and Quality of Strawberry

Keeping this year's setting of strawberry plants free from weeds, and maintaining the soil in good condition right up to freezing weather in the fall is good insurance of yield and quality of fruit in 1926, the fruit men at Cornell college say. It may be necessary, further, to do more or less hand hoeing in addition to horse cultivation to maintain the vigor of the new-forming plants.

When the ground is frozen sufficiently to prevent the wheels of a wagon from cutting through, the strawberry bed may be mulched. This will not only reduce, if not entirely prevent, winter injury from severe cold, but it will help prevent loss from heaving of the plants during the freezing and thawing weather in the early spring.

More injury from heaving takes place on the heavier types of soil than on the lighter sandy or gravelly loams; however, mulching is advisable wherever it is possible to obtain coarse manure or straw for this purpose, the college maintains.

Annual Meeting Next Friday

The annual meeting of the Women's Christian Temperance Union will be held Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. A. J. Usher, 219 Clinton street. There will be a report of the state meeting at Owosso, and music. The social committee will serve.

The people of this community ought to stick together for the benefit of a good town.

M. E. MISSIONARY SOCIETY MEETING

Celebrate Anniversary at Home of Mr. and Mrs. Nordrum.

The Missionary Societies of the M. E. church held their annual birthday meeting with Mr. and Mrs. Oluf Nordrum.

In place of the regular banquet, a social evening was planned, at which the men were guests, as usual. An informal program was carried out, consisting of music, character readings and a talk by the pastor.

Delicious refreshments were served, and, this being the real birthday of Mrs. A. E. Edwards, vice president of the society, a surprise was given her when a large cake was brought in and she was called to light the candles on it.

The offering, which is used for local work, was generous. Many thanks to Mr. Arnold for the fine lap boards he made for the society. An old-fashioned singing of old-time songs closed the evening.

The Mary Brewster Circle will hold a baked goods and fancy work sale Saturday, December 18, at Wood Bros. Luncheon will be served at noon.—Adv. 48-t2.

PRETTY WEDDING IS HOLIDAY EVENT

Groom A Former Resident of Ironton and Well Known.

The following article, taken from the State Journal published at Lansing, Michigan, will be of interest to Charlevoix people, especially those living at Ironton. Mr. Hammond always lived nt Ironton until four years ago, when he went to Lansing. He received his high school education in the Charlevoix public schools:

"Before a banking of palms, ferns and yellow chrysanthemums, in front of which stood tall white tapers at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Acker, 1020 Hickory Street, on Thanksgiving morning, was solemnized the marriage of their daughter, Miss Thera Acker, to Edward Hammand, son of Mr. and Mrs. Grant Hammond.

"Immedintely following the ceremony an informal reception was held and luncheon was served to the guests. Mrs. Hammond who was formerly a teacher in Lansing schools is now engaged in teaching at Kalamazoo. Mr. Hammond, a former Michigan State College student, will attend Kalnmazoo college following the Christmas holidays. After a week-end trip to Chicago, the newly married couple will reside at the Kant apartments in Kalamazoo."

There will be an I. O. O. F. dance Friday evening, December 10.—Adv. 49t1.

BAPTIST CHURCH

Everybody getting rendy to meet old Santa and expect he will come loaded with his gifts. Last Sunday morning the pastor suggested that the Christmas spirit manifest itself in genuine "Neighborliness—Unselfishness—and Service."

Next Sunday, December 12th, there will be the usual services and a hearty invitation is extended to all who not elsewhere engaged to worship with us.

Orders taken at the Holley Gift Shop for engraved cards.—Adv. 48-t2.

FIRST PURCHASER LOCATED IN CLARION

Mrs. Colden Heads List of Christmas Seal Buyers

Mrs. Ruth Colden of Clarion, was the first in Charlevoix county and one of the first persons in the state to purchase 1926 tuberculosis Christmas seals.

Her letter containing a check in full payment for the number of seals sent her was received at the Lansing headquarters of the Michigan Tuberculosis Association in the morning mail the Monday following Thanksgiving even though the letters containing the seals had only gone out on the Wednesday evening preceding Thanksgiving.

Returns from half of the counties in the state were also received. That the response to these letters should be so immediate and so generous is indicative of the high regard the people of Michigan have for the tuberculosis work according to Miss Mary Maier, seal sale director of the Michigan Tuberculosis Association.

QUAINT CHRISTMAS CUSTOMS

Cupid Plays Part in Many of the Superstitions That Are Still Given Consideration.

Good St. Thomas, serve me right
And send me my true love tonight.
That I may gaze upon his face,
Then him in my fond arms embrace.

AFTER placing a piece of holly under her pillow, many a girl, in the north of England especially, repeats these lines to herself before retiring to rest on Christmas eve, according to a writer in London Tit-Bits.

Cupid plays an important part in many of the superstitions and customs that are still extant at this season.

A Christmas practice among superstitious girls who wish to dream about their future lovers is that of abstaining from food or drink or speech during the whole of Christmas eve. Then, after all the family have retired, they make a cake of flour, salt and water, called a "dumb cake." This they eat just before retiring to bed, in the belief that their somewhat indigestible supper will cause them to dream of their future husbands.

In the Alps there exist several charming Yuletide customs of proposing marriage by the language of flowers. If a girl accepts a bouquet of edelweiss from a man during the period from Christmas day to New Year's eve the action denotes that she accepts him as her future husband.

Another Christmas custom in Switzerland is for the young man to place a flower pot, containing a single rose, and a note on the window sill of the girl's room when she is absent from home. He then waits for a reply. If the maid accepts the flower before New Year's eve, then the young man boldly enters the house to "ask papa." If, on the other hand, the rose is not touched, but is allowed to fade away, the proposal is rejected without a single word of love having been exchanged between the couple.

In Sardinia Christmas wooing is far more complicated. If a Sardinian father has a marriageable daughter, the would-be suitor applies to him for permission to speak to her by means of a species of telephone that has been in use for the purpose for centuries of Christmases.

It is a long string with a wooden knob at each end. The girl drops one knob out of her window and, the shutters being closed, places the other knob to her ear. Down below her would-be lover pours words of undying devotion into his knob!

On every New Year's day in Rumania a fair of marriageable girls is held. The girls are all drawn up in one line and the men in another, with the parents of both behind them. If a young man likes the looks of any particular girl he steps out of his line, goes up to her and enters into conversation. If he is favorably received by the girl, his parents and her parents compare notes as to the marriage settlement and similar practical matters.

Many quaint superstitions are associated with the festive season in various parts of Britain. In Hertfordshire the wearing of new shoes on Christmas day is considered to be very unlucky.

THE PATCHWORK QUILT

IT WAS such a sunny December day that Marian could sit on the porch and do her Christmas sewing. This quilt was to surprise her grandmother, for old folks don't expect presents at any time of the year, least of all do they look for such a fine thing as Marian was preparing. It was gay with shreds and patches from many an old dress and the stitches were as neatly and closely put in as any dressmaker could have wished. Besides, upon every patch there was worked the name of someone whom the old lady loved. 'Tids required a good many patches and made quite a large quilt, but the child had worked long and patiently.

She was happily repaid for all her busy care when she saw a happy tear roll down Grandma's cheek as the lovely gift was unfolded, and heard her say: "Now I shall not feel so lonely at night, and what pleasant dreams I shall have, with all my friends around me."—C. G. Hazard.

CHRISTMAS EVE

CHRISTMAS baskets filled with holiday cheer.

Money jingling gaily with no mercenary huriness about it.

Sleigh bells tinkling in the clear, pure air.

Shops alight, and filled with people.

People with countless handles.

Red ribbon, wreaths, Christmas cards selected at the last moment.

Christmas greetings on every lip.

Light in windows of houses.

Trees decorated with tinsel and toys.

Shadows dancing between the fireplace and the tree.

Christmas decorations, never out of style, always lovely.

Christmas plants, bunches of flowers, boxes of candy.

All being bought, delivered or arriving.

Doorbells ringing.

Surprises.

Friends remembering.

Loyalties emphasized.

Kindliness.

Christmas Eve!—Mary Graham Bonner.

Christmas Parcel for Miss Melinda

Package Did Not Contain Expected Ring, but She Became Engaged.

By MARION R. REAGAN

MISS MELINDA BROWN, spinster, had been waiting all year for Peter Moffat to propose. In fact, ever since they had met some two years before, she had felt that Peter could be brought around to take the "big plunge" with her into the sea of matrimony, but things had not gone on so well as she could have hoped. She was sure Peter loved her, but he was an extremely shy man and it required no little pushing to get him up to the point. Several times Melinda thought she "had" him. She had given him every opening by referring coyly to her "own little home—if she ever had one," and to her "lonely life at present," but Peter only sat silent at such remarks, ignoring them completely, or stupidly telling her that after all, many people led more lonely lives than she, and not to be so discontented.

Melinda looked forward to the approaching Christmas season with glee. Surely he would give her a ring for Christmas, after these months of courting.

The season advanced and Christmas arrived bringing a parcel from Mr. Moffat and a note sent from Chicago. Melinda's heart sank when she saw the postmark. "Out of town for Christmas. Then it is all off," she said sadly. She glanced at the package—ten inches square—surely no engagement ring in that." Slowly she untied it. It was writing paper. She opened the letter from him and read:

"Just a Christmas greeting, hoping you will write to me frequently. I shall be in Chicago for several months.

"Sincerely,

"PETER MOFFAT."

Furious, Melinda tore the note into bits. "I shall never look at him again," she breathed. "And after the way I've run after him! But that's been the trouble. I've run after him too much. I shall never write to him. From this out I shall never speak to him again—never speak to him again!" she repeated emphatically.

And Melinda kept her word.

Peter Moffat was growing a little uneasy. Three months had passed and no word from Melinda. It finally became too much even for the patient Mr. Moffat. He felt his temper rising steadily against Melinda. "Thinks she can play a game like that, eh? Run after me while I'm in town and then drop me when I go away. Probably after some other man now." This thought brought crimson flashes of jealousy to the already highly colored cheeks of Peter Moffat. "By George, no woman will make a fool out of me!" he exploded. "I'll go to Springfield tonight and I'll make her marry me. After all these months of courting her, too!"

It so happened that Melinda's cousin, Arthur, who had come from Kansas City was having dinner with her at the hotel the night Peter Moffat came in from Chicago. Peter was hurrying down the street from the station when he happened to look in at the brightly lighted restaurant of the hotel and there—what? He stopped dead still, the evil green monster grisling in his breast. It was Melinda with another man! His first impulse was to rush into the hotel, punch this impertinent stranger and carry Melinda off with him. But this shyness was stronger than his passion and he only turned away, grinding his teeth and clenching his fists. He would see Melinda in the morning at her house!

The next morning about nine o'clock Melinda was surprised to see Peter Moffat at her door. She began to tremble nervously. "Good morning, Peter," she said to him, and extended a cold, moist hand. Peter grunted.

"I've come to talk to you, Melinda," he said very seriously indeed, and closed the door behind him. They sat in the little parlor of the Brown house. "You haven't been playing a straight game with me, Melinda," he began. "I know all about it—you needn't try to explain. I saw you last night, and I've seen you other nights. I don't mind being used as a plaything while you've had these other fellows on the side."

Melinda gasped. "Why Peter Moffat, you—you"—she could think of nothing to say.

"I know all about it," he repeated; "I've been watching you. Now all I've got to say is that I'm not a man to be trifled with. Either you marry me at once or you never will see me again. I want an answer right now, yes or no."

Melinda felt as though she had been suddenly hurled into an avalanche. She could not understand what had gotten into Peter, or what he was referring to. She did know, however, with an ecstatic sense of delight that he was proposing.

"I'll marry you whenever you say, Peter," she said meekly.

Peter, feeling greatly triumphant, leaned over and kissed his future wife tenderly. "We'll be married tomorrow" he said.

THE MISTLETOE

"NO MISTLETOE is needed if the heart is in the right place," people say. But neither is there any real need for a Christmas tree, a special Christmas dinner, a worn-out feeling from doing too much around the Christmas season. There is no actual need of all this. Yet if it were not for all these there would be less happiness and more and more happiness is always needed.

So do not discard the mistletoe. There may be love without it, but it lends a romance, a charm of its own that no heart can dispense with.—Mary Graham Bonner.

LYDIA of the Pines

by Honoré Willsie

(© by Frederick A. Stokes Co.) WNU Service

who was on one of his hurried visits home, when Billy Norton came over to the cottage.

Lydia saw at once that something was wrong.

"What's worrying you, Billy?" she asked.

"Lydia," he said, dropping into Amos' chair and folding his big arms, "you know my tract of land—the one I was going to buy from an Indian? I paid young Lone Wolf a ten-dollar option on it while I looked round to see how I could raise enough to pay him a fair price. He's only a kid of seventeen and stone blind from trachoma. Well, yesterday I found that Marshall had bought it in. He looked young Lone Wolf up and gave him a bag of candy. The Indians are crazy for candy. Then he told him to make his cross on a piece of paper. That that was a receipt that he was to keep and if he'd show it at the store whenever he wanted candy, he'd have all he wanted, for nothing. And he had two half-breeds witness it. What Marshall had done was to get Lone Wolf to sign a warranty deed, giving Marshall his pine land. The poor devil of an Indian didn't know it till yesterday when he showed me his 'receipt' in great glee. Of course, they'll swear he's a mixed blood."

Lydia burst out, "Oh, I wish that reservation had never been heard of! It demoralizes every one who comes in contact with it."

"Lydia," said Billy, slowly, "I'm going to expose Marshall. I'm going to show up his crooked deals with the Indians. I'm going to rip this reservation graft wide open. I'm not going to touch an acre of the land myself so I can go in with clean hands and I'm not going to forget that I came pretty close to being a skunk, myself."

"Oh, but, Billy!" cried Lydia. "There's John Levine and all our friends—oh, you can't do it!"

"Look here, Lydia," Billy's voice was stern, "are you for or against Indian graft?"

Lydia drew a long breath but was spared an immediate answer for there was a knock on the door and Kent came in.

"Well," said Kent, after Lydia had settled them all comfortably, "I just left Charlie Jackson—poor old prune. He's been trying to keep the whites off the reservation by organizing the full bloods to stand against the half-breeds. But after a year of trying he's given up hope. He's drinking a little."

"And still you folks will keep on, stealing the reservation!" exclaimed Billy.

Nobody spoke for a moment. Lydia looked from Billy to Kent, and back again. Kent was by far the handsomer of the two. He dressed well, and sat now, knees crossed, hands clasped behind his head, with easy grace. Billy was a six-footer, larger than Kent and inclined to be raw-boned. His mouth was humorous and sensitive, his gray eyes were searching.

Billy stayed and helped Lydia to clean up the dishes. Kent would never have thought of this, Lydia said to herself with a vague pang. When they had finished Billy gravely took Lydia's coat from the hook and said, "Come, woman, and walk in the gloaming with your humble servant."

Lydia giggled and obeyed. They walked briskly till a rise in the road gave them a view of the lake and a scarlet rift in the sky where the sun had sunk in a bank of clouds.

"Now, Lydia," said Billy, "answer my question. Are you for or against Indian graft?"

Lydia's throat tightened. "I won't take sides against Mr. Levine," she replied.

"Do you mean that you don't want me to expose Marshall?" asked Billy.

"You've no right to ask me that," Lydia's voice was cross.

"But I have, Lydia, though you don't want it, my life is yours. No matter whether we can ever be anything else, we are friends, aren't we, friends in the deepest sense of the word—aren't we, Lydia?"

Friendship! Something very warm and high and fine entered Lydia's heart.

"Yes, we are friends, Billy," she said slowly, "But oh, Billy, don't make me decide that! You'll have to let me think about it. You see, it's deciding my attitude toward all my friends, even toward dad. And I hadn't intended ever to decide."

"And will you tell me, tomorrow, or next day, Lydia?"

"I'll tell you as soon as I decide," she answered.

Amos brought John Levine home with him for supper. It seemed to Lydia that Levine never had been more to her taste. He was that evening the ideal foil to the Indians. In [illegible] top of washing up politics. As the evening drew to a close, and Amos went out to his chick ens as usual after Lizzie had gone to bed, John turned to Lydia.

"Really grown up, aren't you, Lydia? Do you enjoy being a young lady?"

"Yes, I do, only I miss the old days when I saw so much of you. No one will ever understand me as you do."

"Oh, I don't know. There are Billy and Kent."

"There'll never be any one like you." Then moved by a sudden impulse she leaned toward him and said, "No matter what happens, you will always know that I love you, won't you, Mr. Levine?"

John looked at the wistful face, keenly. "Why, what could happen, young Lydia?"

"Oh, lots of things! I'm grown up now and—and I have to make decisions about the rightness and the wrongness of things. But no matter what I decide, nothing can change my love for you."

"When you were just a little tot," said Levine, "you were full of gumption and did your own thinking. And I've been glad to see you keep the habit. Always make your own decisions, dear. Don't let me or any one else decide matters of conscience for you."

He rose as he heard Amos coming in the back door, and with his hand under Lydia's chin, he looked long and earnestly into her eyes. Then as Billy had done earlier in the evening, he sighed, "Oh, Lydia! Lydia!" and turned away.

CHAPTER XIV

Lydia admitted to herself that for years something within her had been demanding that she take a stand on the Indian question, something to which Charlie Jackson and Billy had appealed, something which Kent and John Levine had ignored. Yet neither Charlie nor Billy had really forced her to a decision.

Bit by bit she went over her thinking life, beginning with her first recollection of Charlie Jackson in the class in civil government, and all that was feminine and blind devotion in her fought desperately with all that education and her civic-minded forefathers had given her.

Coming home from her last recitation, one mild afternoon, she stopped at the gate and looked up into the pine tree. And there with the lowing of the Norton herds and the hoarse call of the crows mingling with the soft voice of the pine and the lapping of the lake, she made her decision. For clearly as though the pine had put it into words, something said to Lydia that it was not her business to decide whether or not the Indians deserved to live. It was her business to recognize that in their method of killing the Indians, the whites had been utterly dishonorable. That her refusing to take a stand could not exonerate them. And finally, that by closing her eyes to the facts, because of her love for Levine, she was herself sharing the general taint.

It was Lydia's first acknowledgment of her responsibility to America, and it left her a little breathless and trembling. She turned back to the road and made her way swiftly to the Norton place.

"Billy," she said, paning, her cheeks bright and her yellow hair blowing, "I'm against the Indian grafting."

Billy put out his hand, solemnly, and the two shook hands. For all Billy was four years older than Lydia, they both were very, very young. So young that they believed that they could fight single-handed the whole world of intrigue and greed in which their little community was set. And yet, futile as they may seem, it is on young decisions such as these that the race creeps upward!

"What are you going to do, Billy?" asked Lydia.

"I'm going to get a government investigation started, somehow," he replied. "It'll take time, but I'll get it. It'll be lovely muckraking, Lyd!"

"I hate to think of it," she said unsteadily. "Lizzie is miserable, today. Will you tell your mother, Billy, and ask her to come over to see her this evening? I mustn't stop any longer now."

Poor old Lizzie was miserable. Indeed. For years, she had struggled against rheumatism, but now it had bound her, hand and foot. Ma Norton came over in the evening. Lizzie was in bed shivering and flushed and moaning with pain.

"Ma waited till Lizzie slept, then she told Lydia and Amos that Doctor Fulton had better be called, and Amos, with a worried air started for town at once.

Doctor Fulton shook his head and sighed.

"She's in for a run of rheumatic fever. Get some extra hot water bottles and make up your mind for a long siege, Lydia."

And it was a long siege. Six weeks of agony for Lizzie, of nursing and housework and worrying for Lydia. Ma Norton and the neighbors gave what time they could, but the brunt, of course, fell on Lydia.

Billy called every evening on his way home to supper. John Levine sat up two or three nights a week. Kent came out once a week, with a cheery word and a basket of fruit. And at frequent intervals, the Marshall surrey stopped at the gate and Elviry or Dave appeared with some of Elviry's delicious cookery for Lydia and Amos.

During all this time she said nothing to Billy about his muckraking campaign. He finished his law course in June and entered ex-Senator Alvord's office as he had planned. There was another election in the fall and John Levine was returned to congress, this time almost without a struggle.

Like a bomb, late in December fell the news that the Indian commissioner had been called before a senate [illegible] answer questions concerning the relations of Lake City in the [illegible] with [illegible]

On the heels of this announcement came word that a congressional commission of three had been appointed to sit at Lake City to investigate Indian matters.

"Billy, how did you do it?" asked Lydia, in consternation. He had overtaken her one bitter cold January afternoon, on her way home from college.

"I didn't do much," said Billy. "I just got affidavits, dozens of them, showing frauds, and gave them to Senator Alvord. He has a lot of influence among the senators and is a personal friend of the President."

Lydia's lips were set tightly as she plodded along the snowy road.

"Billy," she said, finally, "are you doing this to get even with Dave Marshall?"

"I'm doing it because I'm ashamed of what New Englanders have done with their heritage. And I'm doing it for you. To make a name for you. You are going to marry me, some day, Lydia."

"I'm not," said Lydia flatly.

Billy laughed. "You can't help yourself, honey. It's fate for both of us. Come along home! You're shivering."

"When you talk that way, I hate you!" exclaimed Lydia, but Billy only laughed again.

The commissioners sat for months and in that time they exposed to the burning sun of publicity the muck of thievery and dishonor on which Lake City's placid beauty was built.

Marriage after marriage of squaws with Lake City citizens was unearthed, most of these same citizens also having a white family. Hundreds of tracts of lands that had been obtained by stealing or by fraud from full bloods were listed. Bags of candy, bits of jewelry, bolts of cotton had been exchanged for pine worth thousands of dollars.

It was a nerve-racking period for Lake City. Whether purposely or not, the net did not begin to close round John Levine till toward the end of the hearing. Nor did Levine come home until late in the summer, when the commission had been sitting for some months.

In spite of a sense of apprehension that would not lift, the year was a happy one for Lydia. In the first place, she went to three college dancing parties during the year. In the second place, Kent asked her to go with him to the last party and, to Lydia's mind, a notable conversation took place at that time.

"Thanks, Kent," said Lydia, carelessly, "but I'm going with Billy."

"Billy! Always Billy!" snorted Kent. "Why, you and I were friends before we ever heard of Billy!"

"Yes," returned Lydia calmly, "You've always liked me as I have you. But you've always been ashamed of my clothes. I don't blame you a bit, but you can imagine how I feel about Billy, who's taken me, clothes or no clothes."

It was Kent's turn to flush.

"Hang it, Lyd, I've been an infernal cad, that's all!"

"And," Lydia went on, mercilessly, "I've got nothing to wear now but the same old graduating dress. I suppose you were hoping for better things?"

"Stop it!" Kent shouted. "I deserve it, but I'm not going to take it! I'm asking you for just one reason and that is, I've waked up to the fact that you're the finest girl in the world. No one can hold a candle to you."

There was a sudden lilt in Lydia's voice that did not escape Kent as she answered laughingly, "Well, if you feel the same after seeing Margery

"All Right," Said Kent Soberly.

this summer, I'll be glad to go to one of the hops next fall with you, and thank you, deeply, Mr. Moulton."

"All right," said Kent, soberly. "The first hop next fall is mine and as many more as I can get."

It was late in the spring and after the conversation with Kent, that it began to be rumored about town that ex-Senator Alvord's office was at the bottom of the Indian investigation. Kent accused Billy of this openly, one Sunday afternoon at Lydia's.

"I'm willing to take the blame, if necessary," said Billy.

These Improvements are Important

There are two general classes of motor car improvements. Those made primarily for their effect on the public—and those made primarily for their effect upon the car.

You will perceive at once that Dodge Brothers new five-bearing crankshaft, two-unit starting and lighting system, air cleaner and other recent improvements, are the sort that represent genuine value.

They are sound and substantial betterments, producing definite and marked results, and as such they are typical of Dodge Brothers methods and product.

MICHIGAN PARKS ARE A RESOURCE

Are Bound to Pay Dividends if Properly Developed.

Tuesday's issue of the Chicago Tribune contained the following article regarding state parks and their importance to the future success of the tourist business in the Wolverine state:

"In its state parks Michigan has a resource,the development of which is bound to pay enormous returns. We write this to urge the reservation and development of more parks along the eastern shore of the lake, and with the promise that if Michigan will create parks close to Chicago, Chicagoans will visit them and bring trade and money and so will the hundreds of thousands who pass through Chicago.

Michigan has more than fifty state parks, nine of them located on Lake Michigan's east shore. The largest of these nine—1,000 acres—is near Muskegon and is still undeveloped. The one nearest Chicago is VanBeren park, 90 acres near South Haven in the process of development. What Michigan should have is more of the 1,000 acre reservations, and closer to Chicago.

The east shore of Lake Michigan is the middle west's Riviera. It draws hundreds of thousands of visitors and tourists every summer. Unlike those who prefer more sophisticated resorts, visitors to Michigan go for the sake of the unique natural beauties of the dunes and woodland. Yet time and convenience demand a short journey and easy access.

Michigan is fully aware of the dividends paid by the tourist and resort business. It will be an enhancement of this source of revenue to create more and larger state parks.

The Mary Brewster Circle will hold a baked goods and fancy work sale Saturday, December 18, at Wood Bros. Luncheon will be served at noon.—Adv. 48-t2.

COLD WAVE HITS NORTHERN MICHIGAN

Thermometer Hovers Around Zero Mark Friday

Old Jack Frost swooped suddenly down out of the north last Friday morning and early risers found the thermometer hovering around the zero mark or below. The entire week end was featured with unusually cold weather, not only in the vicinity of Charlevoix, but over the entire northern section.

Sunday the weather began to moderate, ending with an estimated fall of six inches of the beautiful Tuesday afternoon and evening. The area covered by this heavy snow fall extended south only to Traverse City. Below this point as far as Manistee on M-11, it rained all day Tuesday, the weather being just cold enough to turn it into ice as fast as it fell. Happily there was no wind or the storm would be a repetition of the big sleet storm several years ago.

In the Soo district, hundreds of lake boats are ice bound in the Soo river and channels leading from Lake Huron to Superior. Up to Tuesday night, traffic on the great lakes at this point was at a dead stand-still.

AGED RESIDENT DIED LAST SUNDAY EVENING

Had Been in Failing Health for a Long Period

Mrs. L. H. Wheeler, aged 83, died last Sunday evening at 9:45, at her home on Bridge street, after an illness of considerable duration.

Angeline McClintock was born in Pickron, Canada, December 23, 1843. She lived there until the age of nine years, when she moved with her parents to Sanalac county, Michigan. She was married in Lexington, Sanalac county, to L. H. Wheeler, October 13, 1864, and the couple lived there three years and then took up a homestend in Leelanau county near Traverse City. From there they moved to Traverse City and then to Charlevoix in 1886.

To this union were born three children, two dying in infancy. One son, Charles Wheeler of Muskegon, survives besides the aged husband. Deceased is also survived by two grandchildren, Harry and Angeline Mary Wheeler; two sisters, Mrs. Ellen Prentis of Oukland, Iowa, and Mrs. Sarah Jones of Council Bluffs, Iowa; also two brothers, both Methodist ministers, one residing in Iowa and the other in Washington.

Funeral services were held Wednesday afternnon at 1:30 from the home and at 2 o'clock from the Methodist church, of which Mrs. Wheeler had been a member for 72 years, Rev. C. E. Pollock officiating. Mrs. Wheeler was also a member of the W. R. C., under whose auspices the funeral was conducted.

During her 40 years of residence in Charlevoix, Mrs. Wheeler had acquired u large number of friends, who will regret her departure.

METHODIST CHURCH
C. E. Pollock, Minister

Junior and senior church worship ut 10:00 a. m. next Sunday.

The city band will play an opening concert next Sunday evening at 7:00 for the church services. The public is invited for the music, the message and the worship.

Thursday evening is prayer meeting time. A good service is always had by those who attend. Any person is welcome.

Dr. Frank Wilkinson will be the special speaker at the men's meeting Monday evening at 8:00 o'clock.

Judge Correll gave a very practical address to the men last Monday evening. His subject was "Crime." He insisted that for the prevention of crime we must have capital punishment, quicker method of obtaining a jury, greater reliance placed upon circumstantial evidence, quicker justice, and a sterner set of people in the jury box. It was an awakening address for the men to consideh. The increase of the ratio of criminals in proportion to the population is startling. The address is worthy of repetition.

Great plans are under way for an interesting Vesper Service December 19th.

With a church supper for the public and a Ladies Bazaar on Friday and Saturday at the Charlevoix Hardware Store under the supervision of the Methodist ladies it is a very busy week of women activities for the church.

The Epworth League will hold its regular Sunday devotional service at six p. m. next Sunday.

The Sunday school is doing excellent work and showing a substantial growth. It meets at twelve o'clock each Sunday.

ANNUAL REPORT OF W. C. T. U.

OUTLINE WORK ACCOMPLISHED DURING PAST YEAR

Report Shows Increase in Local Membership and Total of 13,000 in State

The annual report of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for 1926.

During the year "The Day of Prayer," "Victory Day" and "Independence Day" were observed. Live topics, such as the following, conctituted the program: The Volstead Act, World Court, Community Housekeeping, Parent-Teachers' Association, Uniform Dress for School Girls, Women's Place in Politics, Bible in the Public Schools, Direct Primary, National Issues, The Shepard-Towner Bill, The Law Regarding Children Under Seventeen Years of Age Attending Public Dance Halls, The Law on the Sale of Cigarettes, the latter being distributed to all dealers in the city, also in the public and parochial schools with literature on the same subject.

One medal and one essay contest were held. The participants were: Helen Mary Campbell, Helen Smith, Jane Simminaw, Margaret Gimble, Ralph Newman and Stanley Hammond, the last named, receiving the medal. Honor cards were presented to each of the young people by Mrs Jennie Alcox.

The essay contest on "The Evils of the Cigarette," was taken part in by Billy O'Neil, Angie Scott, Stanley Heise and Ruth Smith, in the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th grades of the public schools, and Rex Supernaw, Esther Brady and Betty Jane Cartier.

A community banquet with Judge Parm C. Gilbert as speaker; and a reception to the teachers of the public schools were among the pleasures of the pear.

The flower committee have sent flowers, fruit and words of cheer to the sick and "shut ins" also four baskets at Christmas time.

The union has lost three members by death this year, Mrs. Flora Correll, Mrs. Jennie Alcox and Mrs. Sarah Emrey

A membership drive resulted in twenty-two new members and will be continued this year for active, extension and honorary members, the latter being men who are interested in the work, and pay the annual dues, which are kept in the local treasury.

Delegates to the county, district and state conventions have been in attendance from Charlevoix Union. A W. C. T. U. member from each ward was elected to the Republican county convention. An instruction booth was one of the features at the primary election this fall.

Contributions to the Francis E. Willard and Mary T. Lathrop memorial funds were made by the union.

The active members of the union have been grouped in each neighborhood with a leader and assistnnt for each group. Certain goals have been adopted and neighborhood groups will meet January 28th to become more familiar with the plans of the work of the year.

BOND ISSUE AGAIN LOSES

VOTED DOWN LAST WEDNESDAY 310 TO 134

Plae of Adapting Definite Term Unit Building Plan Meets Approval of Many Now Opposed

The special election held on Wednesday last in an effort to put across a bond issue of $225,000.00 for the building of a central high school and grade building lost by a vote of 134 yes to 310 no, four ballots being spoiled, making the total vote cast 448. This represents as we have been informed, a vote of less than half of the eligible voters in the City and Township of Charlevoix, which constitutes the school district.

At a mass meeting held in the court house Monday eveniog previous to the election, the issue was thoroughly discussed. The room was packing and standing room was at a premium. Attorney R. L. Lewis presided at the meeting. Rev. Herman Burns spoke at length on the bonding proposition, strongly urging the people to think twice before pledging themselves to a 30-year bond issue. In his opinion, the carrying of the issue would result in a heavy tax burden the average person of Charlevoix could not meet without depriving themselves of the real necessities of life.

Straight to the point short talks were made by other members in the audience, some in favor of the bonding issue and others opposed to it. However, the consensus of opinion seemed to be that Charlevoix was greatly in need of better school facilities, but how to get them was the great problem. The result of the vote cast Wednesday seems quite convincing that a 30-year bond issue is not the solution of the problem, so the matter rests in the same position as it did before the special election.

Many people are strongly in favor of a definite building program to cover a period of from six to eight or possibly ten years. This plan to be figured out on the unit system, the first step being the erection of a gymnasium and auditorium, to be followed by additional units until the erection of a building sufficiently large enough to house Charlevoix's school population is completed.

This can be done without the school district being compelled to issue a heavy bond issue, with accompanying interest charges, which, in the average bond issue, amounts to at least two-thirds of the original nmount. As an illustration: Had the bonding issue voted on Wednesday, amounting to $225,000.00, carried, the interest charges during the 30 year period would run close to $162,000.00. Add this to the amount

SOME SAFETY THOUGHTS FOR XMAS SEASON

The Christmas season, that period of the year when joy and happiness should reign supreme and gladness never he dimmed by accidents or adversity, is now knocking at our doors and will be here almost before we are ready for it.

At this time, before we enter into the preparation for the holidays and before the time we will be permitted to participate in the various Christmastide events it may be well for us to stop and think quietly just a minute or two over some simple rules for saftey.

That Christmas Tree: Do not decorate it with flimsy material hung too near candles or lights. Don't decorate your tree with paper, cotton or any other inflammable material. Use tinsel or other non-inflammable material for decorations.

Do not use cotton to represent snow. If you must have snow use powdered mica or asbestos fibro.

Do not permit to be used candles, where electricity can be substituted. Even with the use of electric batteries the same would be far safer than the use of candles.

Let Santa Claus and not the undertaker be your guest Christmas day.

Let the reindeer and sleigh jingle up to your door? Not the red wagons of the fire department.

If the doctor has to be called let it be for the lass or laddie who has eaten too much and not for the child suffering from burns.

A house of merriment is better than a house of mourning. Lets make this Christmas fireproof.

CHRISTMAS ADVS. SHOW PROGRESSIVENESS OF TOWN

We have been reading proofs of the Christmas shopping "ads." of Charlevoix stores that will appear in the Courier today.

They are as interesting as anything that one may peruse these days, for they speak not only of the nppronching yuletide, with all that means, but they illustrate as well the rapid growth of the city and its development.

Sometimes we are apt to think of the modern Charlevoix in terms only of population and of public improvements, street paving, parks, public playgrounds and a dozen other items of the kind.

But the real earmark of the progressive city is its stores.

The real badge of prosperity is the type of retail stores a city boasts.

The advertising columns of the newspaper of today demonstrate the fact that Charlevoix has stores of which any city may be proud and as metropolitan as those of many boasting larger population. And the stores themselves are as interesting as the "ads."

CHAS. EMREY BUYS HAMLIN & FOSTER HOLDINGS

Buildieg Being Remodeled for Use By New Tenaets

Charles H. Emrey purchased the former Sarah Emrey property on Bridge street last week from Hamlin & Foster, who recently acquired it from the Emrey estate, and has started alterations for its new tenants.

The second floor has been remodled, plastered and re-papered and leased to the Loyal Order of Moose, who have already occupied the building. The second flonr will be divided into two sections, the one on the south to be occupied by Kinsey & Buys real estate office after January 1st. The identity of the tenant for the other portion of the building has not been announced, although it is intimated that some retail business will take up that portion.

We are pleased to see the younger generation of progress businessmen take hold of Bridge street property, as it insures future progress.

Now In New Hall

The Loyal Order of Moose are now located in their new hall in tha Emrey building. After Thursday of this week the Moose parlors will be open for members, farmers and town people, where they may go and read nnd listen to the radio. The parlor will be open Thursday afternoon from 2 p. m. to 5 p. m. and Saturday afternoon from 8 a. m. to 5 p. m.

INDEPENDENTS LOSE GAME AT BOYNE CITY

Wineing Three Pniets Made With Only Two Mieutes to Go

The Boyne City Iodependents found plenty of opposition when they ran up against the Charlevoix Independents Monday evening at Boyne City, and emerged from the game with a slight 3 point margin to the good after a see-saw battle throughout.

Boyne City jumped into an early lend soon after the opening whistle, which they held until the third quarter. The half ended 8-6 and the 3rd quarter 14-13 in Boyne's favor. At the beginning of this frame the locals took the lead and held it until within two minutes of the final whistle when Boyne forged ahead and ended the game with a 3 point margin.

All members of the local squad played good basketball. Bucben led the scoring. Charlevoix plays East Jordan here Thursday night.

Birthday Party

Miss Esther Brady entertained eighteen of her young girl friends Monday afternoon at her home on Hurlbut avenue, the occasion being her thirteenth birtbday. Dainty refreshments with a large birthday cake as the center of attraction were enjoyed. Miss Esther received many nice gifts.

FISHERMEN HAVE RIGHTS AFTER ALL

State Supreme Court Reverses Gerhardt-Collins Decision

The following from a recent issue of the Grand Rapids Press disposes of the claim that the public does not have rights oa a navigable stream, but still appears to leave open the subject of their right to fish oa smaller streams where persons who own both banks might therefore claim the streams as private property. The articles follows:

A ruling by Judge Fred S. Lamb of Cadillac that Gideoa Gerhardt was guilty of trespass when he fished the Pine river in Lake county through land owned by Frank Collins of Toledo was reversed by the stnte supreme court.

Gerhardt went into the stream before he reached Collins' property and fished it by wading. Collias charged he had no right to the use of the stream where it ran through his property. A jury in Lake county court found Gerhardt not guilty of trespass, holding the Pine river was n navigable stream and therefore opea to the public. Judge Lamb, in spite of the jury's finding, gave Collins a judgment of six cents.

The case was appealed to the supreme court to test the rights of the fishermen in public waters. The state conservation commission and various sportsmen's organizations backed Gerhardt. Justices McDonald and Fellows, who wrote the reversible opinions, held that Collias owned the land but cannot control the stream as construed by a law of 1891, which permits fishing by the public in rivers of this classification.

"It is immaterial who owns the soil in the navigable rivers. The trust remains. From the beginning the title wns impressed with this trust for the preservation of the public right of fishing. Pine river is nnvigable. In its waters the people hnve the common right of fishing," Justiee McDonald wrote.

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

"Nice thing to do to your friends and neighbors, Bill," Kent went on. "What the dence did you do it for?"

Billy shrugged his shoulders and said nothing. Kent appealed to Lydia. "Would you have gone to partias with him if you'd known what he was doing to his town, Lyd?"

"Kent, I knew it," said Lydia, after a pause.

"You knew it! You let a lot of sickly sentimentality ruin Lake City in the eyes of the world? Not only that. Think what's coming to John Levine! Think what's coming to me, though I've done little enough!"

"Then I'm glad it came to stop you while you'd still done little!" cried Lydia. "Oh, there's Margery! Isn't she lovely!"

It was Margery, just home from boarding school, where she gaily announced as she shook hands she had been "finally finished."

"Margery," cried Lydia, "you're so beautiful that you're simply above envy. What a duck of a dress!"

"Isn't it!" agreed Margery. "What were you all discussing so solemnly when I interrupted?"

"Indian graft!" said Billy, laconically.

"Isn't it awful! Oh, Billy, by the way, daddy says he thinks Senator Alvord started the whole thing. Did he?"

"Yes, and I helped," replied Billy shortly.

"Well, I think you ought to be ashamed of yourself," cried Margery, airily. "Don't you, Lydia?"

"No. I don't, I'm proud of him, though I'm scared to death," said Lydia.

"Well, I just tell you, Billy Norton," there was a sudden shrill note in Margery's voice, "if anything really horrid is unearthed about daddy, I'll never speak to you again. Would you, Kent?"

"I don't intend to anyhow," replied Kent, coolly. "Yet me take you home in my foot-foot."

"But I just got here," protested Margery.

"It's now or never," said Kent, rising. "I've got to r— —."

"Oh, if I's that serious!" Margery took Kent's arm. "By-by, Lydia! Come over and see my new dresses."

After they were gone, Billy sat up and looked at Lydia. "Lydia," he said, "I'm going to quit. You know I've worked with Charlie Jackson right along."

"Quit? But Billy, why I—I didn't think you minded Kent and Margery that much!"

"I don't mind them at all. But Lydia, I found yesterday my father got one hundred and twenty acres from a ten-year-old full-blood boy for five dollars and a bicycle. Last week Charlie unearthed a full-blood squaw from whom your father had gotten two hundred and forty acres for an old sewing machine and twenty-five dollars. I've done so much for the Indians and Charlie is so fond of you that he'll shut these Indians up, but I can't go on, after that, of course."

"Yes, you'll go on, Billy," Lydia's voice was very low. "After I faced what would come to John Levine through this, I can face anything."

Billy gave a little groan and bowed his head on Lydia's knee. Suddenly she felt years older than Billy. She smoothed his tumbled blond hair.

"I told you all the battles of the world were fought for a woman," he said. "Dear, I'll go on, though it'll break mother's heart."

"It won't break her heart," said Lydia. "Women's hearts don't break over that sort of thing."

CHAPTER XV

Ducit Amor Patriae

It was the last week in August when John Lavine was summoned before the commission. Lydia and Amos were summoned with him.

There were two long tables at one end of the room behind one of which sat the three commissioners. At the other table were the official stenographers and Charlie Jackson. Before the tables were chairs and here were John Levine and Kent, Pa Norton, and Billy, old Susie and a younger squaw, with several bucks.

Lydia gave a sigh of relief when Lavine caught her eye across the room and smiled at her. She looked at the commissioners curiously. She knew them fairly well from the many newspaper pictures she had seen of them. The fat gentleman, with penetrating blue eyes and a clean-shaven face, was Senator Smith of Texas. The roly-poly man, with black eyes and a grizzled beard, was Senator Elway of Maine, and the tall, smooth-shaven man with red hair was Senator James of New York.

"Mr. Levine," said Senator Smith, "we have found that you had carried on so many—er—transactions that we finally decided to choose three or four sample cases and let our case stand on those. Jackson, call Crippled Bear."

Charlie spoke quickly to one of the bucks, who rose and took the empty chair by Charlie.

He began to talk at once, Charlie interpreting slowly and carefully.

"I am a mixed blood. Many moons ago the man Levine found me drunk in the snow. He picked me up and kept me in his house over night. When I was sober, he fed me. Then he made this plan. I was to gather half a dozen half-breeds together, he could trust. In the spring he would come up to the reservation and talk to us. I did this and he came. We were very hungry when he met us in the woods and he gave us food and money. Then he told us he was going to get the big fathers at Washington to let us sell our pines so we could always have money and food. Never be hungry any more—never.

"Then he said while he was getting that done, he would pay us a little every month to go through the woods and chop down the best trees. The Big Father will let whites get 'dead and down' timber out of Indian woods, he said. But not let whites cut any. So we say yes, and though full bloods are very mad when we cut down big trees, we do it. For many moons we do it and in winter, white men haul it to sawmills.

"Every little while, Levine comes up there and we have a council and tell him everything that happens. All about things Marshall and other whites do. And he pays us always. Then he tells us that the Big Father will let mixed bloods sell their pine lands but not full bloods. So then we agree when he wants any full blood land to swear that any full blood is mixed. And we have done this now, perhaps twenty times."

The mixed blood and Charlie paused. Mr. Smith took up a paper. "I have here, Mr. Levine, a statement of your dealings with the Lake City Lumber company. You have had sawed by them during the past six or eight years millions of feet of pine lumber. I find that you are holding Indian lands in the name of Lydia Dudley and her father, Amos Dudley, these lands legally belonging to full bloods. Amos Dudley is also the purchaser of land from full bloods, as is William Norton, Sr., through you."

Levine rose quickly. "Gentlemen," he exclaimed, "surely you can find enough counts against me without including Miss Dudley, who has never heard of the matter you mention."

Commissioner James spoke for the first time. "Suppose we go on with the witnesses before we open any discussion with Mr. Levine. Jackson, what have these squaws to tell?"

Charlie called old Susie. And old Susie told of the death of her daughter from starvation and cold, this same daughter having sold her pines to Levine for a five-dollar bill and a dollar watch. She held out the watch toward Levine in one trembling old hand.

"I find this in dress, when she dead. She strong. It take her many days to die. I old. I pray Great Spirit take me. No! I starve! I freeze! I no can die. She young. She have little baby. She die."

Suddenly, she flung the watch at Levine's feet and sank trembling into her chair.

There was silence for a moment. In at the open window came the rumble of a street car. Levine cleared his throat.

"All this is dramatic, of course, but doesn't make me the murderer of the squaw."

"No! but you killed my father!" shouted Charlie Jackson. And rising, he hurled forth the story he had told Lydia, years before. Lydia sat with her hands clasped tightly in her lap, her eyes fastened in horror on Charlie's face. It seemed to Lydia that the noose was fastened closer round John's neck with every word that was uttered.

Suddenly she sprang to her feet. "Stop, Charlie! Stop!" she screamed. "You shan't say any more!"

Senator Elway rapped on the table. "You're out of order, Miss Dudley," he exclaimed, sharply.

Lydia had forgotten to be embarrassed. "I can't help it if I am," she insisted. "I won't have Charlie Jackson picturing Mr. Levine as a fiend, while I have a tongue to speak with. Mr. Levine's not a murderer. He couldn't be. He's been as much to me as my own father ever since my mother died when I was a little girl. He's understood me as only my own mother could.

"You think he could murder when he could hold a little girl on his knees and comfort her for the death of her little sister, when he taught her how to find God, when—oh, I know he's robbed the Indians—so has my own father, it seems, and so has Pa Norton, and so has Kent, and all of them are dear people. They've all been wrong. But think of the temptation, Mr. Commissioner! Supposing you were poor and the wonderful pines lay up there, so easy to take."

"You're covering a good deal of ground and getting away from the specific case, Miss Dudley," said Smith. "Of course, what you say doesn't exonerate Mr. Levine. What you say of his character is interesting but there remains the fact that he has been proceeding fraudulently for years in his relations to the Indian lands. You yourself don't pretend to justify your acts, do you, Mr. Levine?"

Lydia sat down and Levine slowly rose and looked thoughtfully out of the window. "The legality or illegality of the matter has nothing to do with the broader ethics of the case, though I think you will find, gentlemen, that my acts are protected by law," he said. "The virgin land lies there, inhabited by a degenerate race, whose

ONE can't feel well when there is a retention of poisonous waste in the blood. This is called a toxic condition, and is apt to make one tired, dull and languid. Other symptoms are sometimes toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Many people have learned the value of Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, when the kidneys seem functionally inactive. Everywhere one finds enthusiastic Doan's users. Ask your neighbor!

MEN OF Charlevoix County

We're extremely proud of the opportunity given us last week to take a large portion of a well known Manufacturer's surplus stock (created by poor credit risks) of Men's Fine All Wool Suits, at a ridiculously low figure, to sell what we could of them and ship the rest back. Of course they figure there won't be any left (at this low price) to go back, and we think so too, BUT—HERE'S THE POINT—Having these Suits only for a week or ten days, with the privilege of returning them, we're not taking any chances on being "caught with the goods," and therefore can and are going to sell them at a very, very close profit. They were manufactured to sell at $25, $30 and $35, all this season's styles, and we are putting them all in one big group, so you can look to your heart's content and pay only one price.

SUCH STATE AID IS JUSTIFIED

The Michigan Real Estate Association has joined the list of organizations appealing to the state legislature for appropriation during the coming year of funds for the advertising of Michigan. The wisdom of such an appropriation often has been pointed out. Tourist and development agencies have advocated legislative aid from state funds. But nothing ever has been accomplished, although there has been much talk at Lansing of the importance of our tourist and resort business. With the 1927 session of the Michigan Legislature drawing near, it would seem that best results can be accomplished by uniting the forces of Michigan development agencies in a common appeal to the legislature, instead of besieging that body with individual petitions.

In western Michigan, the Michigan Tourist and Resort Association and the new West Michigan Development League are urging the legislature provide funds for advertising the states attractions to tourists. On the other side of the state, the East Michigan Association is making a similar plea, and in the Upper Peninsula another organization is also interested. If the four organizations, with the Real Estate Association and backed by the various associations of commerce, were to combine their efforts, the general state-wide nature of this united appeal would be far more impressive than the scattered shot of the individual groups.

As a matter of plain common sense the state of Michigan should advertise itself. Western states, appealing to the tourist business, use public funds for their advertising. The business wisdom of such expenditure is obvious. No other business distributes its profits over as wide a field as the tourist trade. Aid for the development of the tourist business benefits all of Michigan. That such aid should come from the state is a sound business proposition.

MORE BUNK FROM CHICAGO

In the critical matter of Lake Michigan water diversion, here's another perfect exnmple why Chicago lacks sympathetic and congenial and deferential neighbors. The Tribune pounces upon the city of Erie for polluting Lake Erie; and then mockingly says, incident to Erie's participation in law suits to stop Chicago's drainage diversion, that "this same Erie city with its unlawful cradle of filth" is trying "to force Chicago to make its own Lake front a plague-laden sewer bowl." Nobody is trying to do anything of the sort. If Chicago will scientifically dispose of its own sewnge at its own expense by modern methods, it need have no "sewer bowl" and it need not steal 10,000 cubic feet of water (which does not belong to it) per second from Lake Michigan. We hold no brief for Erie. If it is guilty of creating a "cradle of filth" in Lake Erie it ought to be stopped—and forced to purge its sewage at its own expense. In other words, it should take the medicine which The Tribune inferentially recommends. But so [illegible] We weary of the everlasting Chicago pretense that the only alternative to this enormous lake diversion is a disease-plagued city. The correct alternative is scientific sewnge disposal at the expense of those thus served—and not at the expense of the natural heritage of all the lake states. Chicago cannot expect "sympathy" from neighbors who know n hawk from a handsaw, and the difference between an "excuse" and a "reason." Chicago's propaganda, like its sewage, needs a filter.

A remarkable Vesper Service is planned for next Sunday at 4:15 p. m., a Bethlehem service of music, Christmas memories and message. It will be rendered by the augmented choir and pastor. You may bring your friends and get a new and a renewed vision of the meaning of Christmas. All are always welcome. Put n pleasant place in your Sunday afternoon by attending church before Christmas.

One hundred new hymn books have been placed in the church for public use. Be on hand next Sunday and each Sunday and keep yours in use.

The Epworth League will hold its devotional service at six p. m. next Sunday.

Church School Christmas exercises will be rendered Christmas eve. Santa Claus, a Christmas Tree and gifts will feature the evening.

Men's meeting next Monday evening will begin with a chicken pie supper. The speaker of the evening will be Mr. Feuer, superintendent of public schools at Boyne City. Invitations are on hand for fifty or more men. If you wish a place at the table better get in touch with the president, Mr. Frank Bird, or call the pastor about it. Another of the great and good times is in store for the men. Any man is welcome to attend, but the committee ought to know if you are coming so ample provision may be made. This is not a paid supper. Join the men, that is all.

Christmas Comes But Once a Year

However, we are mighty glad that it comes that often, for we believe that Christmas time when observed in the true Christmas spirit is a most useful season of the year, and we know that we always enjoy seeing our friends have a good time at this period.

It seems right that one week of the year should be given over especially to the cultivation of friendship, good will and innocent festive pleasures. May your Christmas be as merry and as lasting as you could desire, and the New Year filled with peace, health, happiness and plenty.

Whatever became of the old-fashioned girl who, at this time of year, hnd a dresser drawer full of doilies and fancy work prepared for Christmas giving?

Max Fralick has taken his new tug, Liberty, recently purchased from Harold McCann, to Racine, Wisconsin, where he will continue fishing operations this winter.

The Charlevoix county road commission will have completed the job of putting up 10,000 feet of picket type snow fence, furnished by the state highway department, by the end of this week.

The minstral show put on by the Charlevoix high school athletic association last Friday nfternoon and evening netted around $180.00. The performance was largely nttended nt both showings and was a fine success.

Harold and Ulysses McCann left the first of this week for Manitowoc, where they will have a new Deisel engine installed in the Sea Hawk. Harold McCann has bought a half interest in the boat, whigh will be used for fishing.

Phil Howe and Ted Coblentz nrrived in Charlevoix Wednesday after driving through from Detroit, from which point they started Monday morning. They experienced much difficulty on account of the snow, ice nnd heavy storms.

The weather man is on a rampage ngain. Wednesday morning the thermometer hovered around the zero mark and with the accompanying northwest wind, the day is one that will be remembered by the "old timers" as somewhat unusual for this time of the year.

Members of the men's church class of the Methodist church were guests at a venison supper at the church last Monday evening. A brief address by Judge Correll was well received as was the short talk hy Rev. Pollock. Hymn slides were used for the song service.

In spite of the large number of activities in progress Tuesday evening, the lecture course at the Palace theater was well attended. The program offered hy the Chicago Male Quartett was exceedingly well rendered and highly appreciated.

Mrs. Willinm Poole's churchschool class banqueted last Friday evening and had a jollifiention for an evening. They are n fine clnss of boys and Mrs. Poole is doing them a lot of good. Mr. and Mrs. Pollock nnd some of the boy's parents were guests and helpers for the occasion.

At Milwaukee Tuesday several men were taken to the hospital with frozen feet or hands after 100 workers had labored all night to free a car ferry which went aground in Lake Michigan. In Minnesota all trains were halted by the drifting snow and relief trains were sent out to rescue the passengers.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis S. Orlowski and children left Tuesday for Victor, Iowa, where they will visit at the home of Mrs. Orlowski's parents. From there they will go to various points in the southwest with the hopes of finding a climate that will be beneficial to their son, who has for some years been n continuni sufferer from asthma.

Road workers hope that today's storm will not tie up the main highways north and south through northern Michigan. M-13 and M-11 were opened Sunday at points south of Elmira and Beulah but last night's freeze nnd today's snow may fill the cuts again. Thus far the state's big rotary plow has not been plnced in commission, delay being caused by the repair work on the giant tractor at Kalknska repair shop. The road crews, evidently had not expected the heavy winter storms to come so enrly in the senson and were not ready.

Party Was Well Attended

The party in the Congregational church diningroom last Monday evening under the auspices of the C. E. society, was well attended by the members and invited guests, who had a jolly time together with games and stunts of various kinds. After refreshments were served, a sing around the piano completed one of the pleasantest social affairs ever arranged by the society.

FERRY TRAFFIC IS TREMENDOUS

NEARLY 80,000 CARS HANDLED THIS PAST YEAR

This Represents a Third Greater Number Than Records for 1925 Indicate

The state ferry, Mackinaw City, one of Michigan's two car ferries operating between Mackinaw City and St. Ignace, tied up at the upper coal dock in Cheboygan where she will lay at her moorings for the winter. Captain Mays, commodore of the fleet at the atralts was in charge of the ferry when she arrived and gave out some interesting figures on the number of cars transported between the upper and lower peninsula this summer, While the figures are unofficial and only approximate, they give sufficient information for a basie of figuring tho tremedous development of the transport business during the last few years.

The business thia year, deapite the fact that the season was backward and was not overly conducive to auto travel at all times, showe for the number of cars transported between the peninsulas, a tremendous increase over the previous high record of 1925 when more than 0,000 care were handled.

Captain Mays stated, he believed the figures on the number of cars transported this season will total well over 80,000 or a third more than the number of cars handled in 19—.

The figures for the past several years are given as follows:

19t8	700
1919	1,600
1920	3,472
1921	4,731
1922	9,362
1923	1[illegible],820
1924	[illegible],631
1925	60,000
1920	80,000

Greater things are looked for next season at the Straits. It is generally conceded that the two boats can not, under the present conditions, care for the auto travel at this point without some delay at the height of the season and for some months back the state highway department has been talking of another ferry making three instead of two.

Tho addition of one ferry it is believed would adequately care for the demand during the busiest seasons and during the other times only two boats would probably be operated.

In all probability the highway department will attempt to gauge the business next summer with the two boats and is prepared to put a third one on the following year.

The state ferries were put into operation in t923. Prior to that time the car ferries at the Straits handled the autos traveling between the peninsulas which, to a certain extent, accounts for the number of tourists' cars handled. The excessive cost as compared with the present rate had much to do with the travel north.

It will he noted that in the four seasons the state ferries have been in operation, the increase in travel is more than 400 per cent at this point.

LOCAL TEACHER AND LOCAL NEWSPAPER

Republican-News States Views on Broad Subject

The Republican-News has added another Macklnac county teacher's name to its subscription list. It appreciates the patronage, and would like to see moro of the county teachers taking the county newspaper. In fact, and to be frank, it thinks the least a teacher can do is to eubscribe for the county newspaper where he or she is teaching. In Mackinac county it is natural and the conceit is pardonable for the Republican News to thinks itself the best paper for teachers: but in any event and whichever his choice may be the teacher should have at least one of the county papers; if not this one, then the other.

This subscription, however, is by no means a condition to obtaining publicity for school news—not with this paper, nor, it feels safe to say, with its neighbor. Come along with your news, the Republican-News knows it well promote interest in the school; so this paper welcomes school notes from any school in Mackinac county.

Teachers are now getting salaries such aa were never dreamed of years ago. A member of the faculty of our normal schools taught in our city schools for $40 a month. A similar teacher now-a-days often gets threo times that aum, and then thinks it very small. It is not too much, either, provided tbe teachers give back the service it is supposed to buy.

A teacher now-a-days must be far more than one jump ahead of his or her pupils. The teacher must be educated, must be expert, and must be a live number. Taxpayers are willing to pay these higher wages because they are no longer willing to have their children experimented upon by untrained, unskilled and raw novices. But if they pay the price, they want the goods. "Working for fat pork and sundown" used to be the familar and expressive description of the lazy lumberjack; it applied—and still applies—to some teachers.

The alert teacher, "inter alia," takes a lively interest in the people, affairs, news nnd "doings" of tho locality; the alert teacher needs and takes the loesl newspaper.—St. Innace Republican-News.

ANNUAL REPORT OF W. C. T. U.

a very inspiring report. Mrs. E. L. Calkins, retires as state president after twenty-one years of servico in this offiee. Mrs Calkins' address contained some very pointed facts, among which were; "Those who say, 'prohibition can not be enforced', are trying to convince the world that a republic cannot control the lawlessness within her own border; and all this talk about light wines and beer, straw votes, and differently worded referendums are simply entering wedges to pry the eighteenth amendment from the constitution. And we are not blind to the fact that enforcement has been made a political football. But, laws enacted by an honorable process, after long deliberation, cannot be defied, nor the power of government to enforce them be questioned.

Public sentiment must be educated to include total nbstinence for the individual, prohibition for the state, nation, and the world. Purity of life for men and women and equality before the law."

Michigan has more then thirteen thousand members in the W. C. T. U.; a net gain of 807 members last year.

Mrs. A. J. Usher entertained tho union for the December meeting. The social committee served dainty refreshments.

RE COUNTY FUNDS NEEDED

HOITER WOULD DIVIDE FEES ON NEW BASIS

ests Larger Percentage Should go Into County Road Building

"County highways in Michigan are fering rapid depreciation due to dly increasing traffic. The pre- nt weight tax appropriation for unty highways is insufficient for th adequate maintenance and new onstruction." This statement, mnde y Edward N. Hines of the Wayne ounty road commission, followed a resolution passed unanimously by the commission, that counties should share upon a 50-50 basis the money realized from motor license foes (weight tax) for the maintenance and construction of county roads.

"With a promised increase of more than $3,000,000 in t927 over the 1926 total appropriation for all state highways, amounting to approximately $30,500,000, there is no logical basis for continuing to deprive the counties of their just and needed half of the weight tax appropriation," said Mr. Hines.

Should Split up Funds

At the last session of the legislature it was repeatedly stated, and authoritatively, that not more than $8,000,000 could be economically spent on new construetion of state highways. Yet with the weight tax and gas tax swelling the state coffers to $14,500,000 over and above all specific appropriations, the counties continue to carry a daily increasing volume of traffle on their roads without sufficient funds from the licenae feee for adequate maintenance of county roads.

"Before the law was amended to its present percentage of appropriation, counties shared equally with the etate, the motor license return, known as the weight tax. Recent experience has proved that the amendment, as it results today, deprives county roads of the maintenanee due them according to the percentage of duty which they serve. Automobiles throughout the counties provide this fund for the state, but the owners are forced to operate them over congested county roads for their majority of travel.

"Few people realize the extent to which county roads are utilized for general travel as well as heavy trucking, with the increasing congestion of trunk lines, county roads are carrying a dougle volume of traffic while funds for their maintenance have been materially reduced by the recent amendment. Now that sufficient funds are available in 1927 to afford the stnte almost double the amount which the authorities have admitted that they could economically spend, the present law should be amended to re-establish the 50-50 appropriation between stnte nnd county highways.

Need Roads Everywhere

"No longer is Michigan a vast expanse of waste which must be traversed by the shortest route. Even the most remote corners of nearly every county treasures a natural beauty which the touring world has recently demanded to explore. Good roads into every territory of the state will do for Michigan what improved highways have done for Colorado and California. But to capitalize upon the desirability of Michigan's summers' the people of the state must awake to the need of providing better roads into every county of the state. Tourists have grown in numbers to the extent that new drives, new lakes, and new gaming grounds must be exploited if undesirable congestion on highways and at resorts is to be averted.

"Were it a demand for an increased tax upon the motorist, I would feel great reluctance in pressing the need of more appropriation for county roads. However, it is merely a matter of proper distribution of the funds now available for highway purposes, and unless something in the way of legislative amendment ie done to relieve the existing burden on county highways, it may prove more costly to the state in the end."

LYDIA of the Pines

by Honoré Willsie

(© by Frederick A. Stokes Co.) WNU Service

car hope of salvation lay in amalgamation with the white race. An ignorant government, when land was plenty and the tribe was larger, placed certain restrictions on the reservation. When land became scarce, and the tribe dwindled to a handful, those restrictions became wrong. It was inevitable that the whites should override them. Knowing that the ethics of my acts and those of other people would be questioned, I went to congress to get these restrictions removed. If another two years could have elapsed, before those investigations had been begun, the fair name of Lake City never would have been smirched." Levine's hand on the back of his chair tightened as he looked directly at Billy Norton.

Once more Lydia came to her feet. "Oh, Mr. Levine," she exclaimed, "don't put all the blame on Billy! Really, it's my fault. He wouldn't have done it if I hadn't agreed that it was right. Oh, it is all my fault," she repeated brokenly, "all the trouble that's come to Lake City."

Billy Norton jumped up. "That's blamed nonsense!" he began, when Smith interrupted him, impatiently.

"Be seated, Norton." Then, gently, to Lydia, "My dear, you mean that, knowing what an investigation would mean to the people you love, you backed young Norton in instigating one."

"Yes, sir," faltered Lydia.

"Can you tell us why?" asked Elway, still more gently.

Lydia twisted her hands uncomfortably and looked at Billy.

"Go ahead, Lyd," he said, reassuringly.

"Because it was right," she said, finally. "Because—Dulcit Amor Patrine—you know, because no matter whether the Indians were good or bad, we had made promises to them and they depended on us." She paused, struggling for words.

"I did it because I felt responsible to the country like my ancestors did, in the Civil war and in the Revolution, to—to take care of America, to keep it 'clean,' no matter how it hurt. I—I couldn't be led by love of country and see my people doing something contemptible, something that the world would remember against us forever, and not try to stop it, no matter how it hurt."

Trembling so that the ribbon at her throat quivered, she looked at the three commissioners, and sat down.

"I suggest that we adjourn for lunch," said Smith. "Miss Dudley, you need not return."

While her father paused to speak to Kent and Levine, Lydia made her escape.

She expected John Levine to come home with her father to supper, and for the first time in her life, she did not want to meet her best loved friend. But she might have spared herself this anxiety, for Amos came home alone. Levine was busy, he said.

To Lydia's pain and disappointment, Levine did not come to the cottage before he returned to Washington, which he did the week following the hearing. And then, all thought of her status with him was swallowed up in astonishment over the revelations that came out early in September when Dave Marshall and the Indian agent were called before the commission.

Dave Marshall was the owner of the Last Chance! The Last Chance where "hussies" lay in wait like vultures for the Indian youths, took their government allowances, took their ancient Indian decency, and cast them forth to pollute their tribe with drink and disease. The Last Chance! The headquarters for the illegal selling of whisky to Indians. Where Indians were taught to evade the law, to carry whisky into the reservation and where in turn the bounty for their arrest was pledged to Marshall. The Last Chance, the main source of Dave Marshall's wealth!

Even Lake City was horrified by these revelations. People began to remove their money from his bank and for a time a run was threatened, then Dave resigned as president and the run was stayed. The drug store owned by Dave was boycotted. The women of the town began to cut Margery and Elviry.

Lydia, sitting on the front steps in the lovely September afternoons, rubbed Adam's ears, watched the pine and the Norton herds and thought some long, long thoughts. Finally, one hazy Saturday afternoon, she gathered a great bunch of many colored asters and started off, without telling Lizzie of her destination.

It was nearly five o'clock when she stopped at the Marshalls' gate. Elviry opened the screen door and Lydia marched in and paused. Dave Marshall was sitting by the kitchen table, his hat on the back of his head, a pile of newspapers on the floor beside him. He did not speak to Lydia when she came in.

This was worse than Lydia had thought it would be. She had not calculated on Dave's being at home. At that moment there was a light step in the dining room, and Margery came into the kitchen. When she saw Lydia she gasped.

"Hadn't you heard? Oh, Lydia! You came anyhow!" and suddenly Margery threw herself down and sobbed with her face in Lydia's lap.

Elviry threw her apron over her head and Dave, with a groan, dropped his head on his chest. For a moment, there was only the crackling of the fire in the stove and Margery's sobs to be heard.

Then Dave said, "What did you come for, Lydia? You only hurt yourself and you can't help us. I don't know what to do! God! I don't know what to do! I want Margery and her mother to pack up and go away—for good. I'll close up here and follow when I can. None of these cases will ever come to anything in our state court. It's the disgrace—and the way the women folks take it."

"I—I've been thinking," said Lydia, timidly, "that what you ought to do—I don't think it would do a bit of good for you all to go away. The story would follow you. Mr. Marshall ought to sell out everything and buy a farm. Let Mrs. Marshall go off for a visit, if she wants to, and let Margery come and stay with me a while and go to college."

Dave raised his head. "That's what I'd rather do, Lydia for myself. Just stay here and fly to live it down. I'd like to farm it. Always intended to."

"I don't see why she needs to go to your house," said Elviry. "Let her stay right here, and go up to college with you if she will. And I don't want to go live on a farm, either."

"Elviry," said Dave grimly, "our day is over. All we can hope to save out of the wreck is a future for Margery. Just get that through your head once and for all. I think Lydia's idea is fine sense. But it's for Margery to decide."

Margery rubbed her hand over her forehead. "Well," she said, "I don't see that I'd gain anything but a reputation for being a quitter. If I went to Lydia's. I'll stay with you folks, but I'll go to college, if Lydia'll stand by me."

Lydia rose. "Then that's settled. On Monday we'll register. I'll meet you on the eight o'clock car."

"I can't thank you, Lyd—" began Margery.

"I don't want any thanks," said Lydia, making for the door, where Dave intercepted her with outstretched hand.

Lydia looked up into his dark face and her own turned crimson. "I can't shake hands," she said, "honestly, I can't. The Last Chance and the—the starving squaws make me sick. I'll stand by Margery and help you—but I can't do that."

Dave Marshall dropped his hand and turned away without a word and Lydia sped from the house into the sunset.

The Community Supper Really Like Christmas

"THESE community suppers are always so stupid!" declared a pretty girl to a small group around her. "I wish we could put some pep and fun into this one and give the people a good time. Something really like Christmas, and not so dull."

The others—looked dubbons and scratched their heads. "What'll we do?" they asked.

"I know!" declared the pretty girl. "Just got the idea. Now, listen everyone! Why not imitate the way they used to do in olden times? A minstrel in the gallery, lots of minstrels! Singing and playing on horns and things! Hide them by screens covered with greens. Let the people get seated at the tables, then all pipe up with old songs every one knows. Dress the minstrels in gay colors. Then have them come down the stairs singing and playing. Let them wind among the tables. Have a jester in front joking and making fun. A real old English custom. It will help a lot and give the diners a good time."

"And," added another, fired with enthusiasm, "red candles on the tables, wreaths at all the windows, waitresses with red ribbons about their heads and a sprig of holly tucked over one ear."

"Not to mention," laughed a third, "a dinner of roast turkey, cranberry sauce, mashed potatoes, rolls, coffee and mince pie!"

"Right-o!" said the rest.

And so it was done. The very merriest community supper that was ever given in that town.—Patience Eden.

Sing Heigh-Ho! Unto The Christmas Holly

NOTHING quite so typifies the spirit of Christmas as a bough of beautiful, glistening foliaged and scarlet-berried holly. Holly seems the quintessence of Yule and should and generally does occupy the place of honor in Christmas decorations.

There are states where the holly isn't to be found in great abundance. In some sections of the South a limited supply must be made to serve the purpose. For profuse decorations other greens fashioned from sprays of Irish yew whose fan-like and lacy foliage is ideal for this use; and, too, there are the beautiful, waxy leaves from the magnolia as well as cedar.

But the holly bough, of course, of all Christmas green is the loveliest and most popular, not only here but in other lands and in France, in particular, as Brittany grows it in quantities. The holly is of slow growth and propagated by seed which do not germinate until the second year. We think of holly berries always as being red, but some kinds bear yellow fruit, some white, and others even black.

The holly has a commercial value that isn't generally known. Its even-grained and hard wood is ivory white and is used for inlaying and as an ebony substitute for teapot handles and other articles, when stained. The leaves are used in medicine.—Frances Marshall Morgan.

More Value than the Price Suggests

In the year just drawing to a close the price of Dodge Brothers Motor Cars was materially lowered.

Yet during this period more important improvements were incorporated than in any year in Dodge Brothers history. Advances were made in engineering and body designs. The cars possess a greater degree of smoothness, silence and ease. They are more comfortable, more beautiful.

Current prices — made possible, of course, by constantly mounting sales — are therefore not an obvious measure of value. Prices, in fact, have never told the full story of Dodge Brothers dependability and basic worth.

But now, more than ever before, there is far more value than the price suggests.

CITY BAND PLAYED AT M. E. SERVICE

Congregation Last Sundey Evening Pleased With Selections

A large church full of people listened with great appreciation to the band concert and the pastors message last Sunday evening at the Methodist Episcopal church.

The city band very generously gave of their talent and time, playing several appropriate selections and greatly pleasing our home people. The band is one of the essential institutions in aur city's program of activities and the church keenly appreciated their generaus musical contributions to the entertainment and worship of the evening last Sunday.

The pastor preached on the subject, "Marching To Music." His theme was that while life is a marching program from the cradle to the grave, Christinn song and music gives cheer, winsomeness, power and appreciation to the journey which otherwise would he drab and colorless. He emphasized that Christ had put a new song into the hearts and upon the lips of humanity.

FIRE DESTROYS SHARROW HOME

Oil Stove Explosion Results in Disastrous Blaze

The home of Bert Sharrow on Alice street was almost completely destroyed by fire at around 4 o'clock last Saturday afternoon.

The blaze started from an oil stove explosion in the kitchen. Mrs. Sharrow had lit the stove preparatory to getting the evening meal and had gone to another part of the house. Upon returning to the kitchen she found the whole room ablaze. The alarm was turned in immediately, but by the time the department arrived the whole inside of the structure was afire.

A small quantity of household furniture, groceries and supplies were removed to safety.

BOND ISSUE AGAIN LOSES

of the bond issue, we would in 30 years have approximately $387,000 invested in a $225,000 school building.

Building on the unit plan would practically eliminate interest charges. According to the Board of Education, at the end of the present school year we will have a surplus of $40,000 or more. The five mill sinking fund on the school district's assessed valuation runs close to $20,000 a year. Add this to the $40,000 or more surplus and we will have in the neighborhood of $60,000.00. Use this money for the building of the first unit. There has been no interest carrying charges on it. Instead, it has been drawing at least four per cent interest. If this is not enough to cover the expense of the first unit, add another mill or two and raise the necessary amount. Then build, and keep the sinking fund in operation until enough has accumulated for the second unit, and so on until we have builded a $250,000.00 or $300,000.00 central school building without involving ourselves in the payment of heavy interest charges.

This sounds like good business to us, and we believe if the proposition is handled in the right manner, within a few years Charlevoix will have a school building second to none in Northern Michigan.

We are also of the opinion that many opposed to a bonding issue will be heartily in favor of a program af this kind. But of all things, let'a keep away from having to pay interest charges on a bond issue. Interest charges on previous city bond issues have in each instance kept our noses on the grindstone too long to again repeat the experience.

C. H. S. DEBATERS WIN CLOSE DECISION

Negative Team Returned Victor Over Petoskey

Charlevoix high school's negative debating team won a close 2 to 1 decision over Petoskey's affirmative team at Charlevoix last Friday night, December 10th.

The subject of the debate was, "Resolved, That the United States Government Should Own the Coal Mines." The local high school was represented by Francis Martin, Norman Shanahan, Charles Sterritt and Keith Reynolds. The team is being coached by Oscar North, principal. The judges were Supt. Davis of Bellaire, Miss Hamilton and Supt. Kaake of Harbor Springs.

THE DAY OF DAYS

RING out glad bells across the earth—Christmas has come again! Ring out the glad tidings from land to land, from shore to shore in peals of sounding joy, in crashing strains of tumultuous welcome. Christmas! the day of days! has come to cheer and gladden the earth again, to bring each and every one of us new hope and new faith. ¶ The old and the young, the grave and the gay, look for its coming with the same eagerness and delight, with the same confidence and optimism. For we never grow too old to catch the message of Christmas each year but adds to the delight with which we greet it. ¶ Perhaps, as little children this delight manifested itself more plainly, yet, it was not as deep, as heartfelt, as that which comes to us we grow older, for each Christmas has added unto itself so many dear associations, so many precious memories that we find ourselves treasuring the day more and more as the years go by. ¶ The love of those around our own home and hearth, the kind remembrance and good wishes of our friends, the host of sweet, unforgettable things that are ours at this time makes Christmas stand out in our memories as a day of happiness untold. ¶ Let the glad bells peal their tidings of joy—let holly and mistletoe hang everywhere—let merriment and thanksgiving and feasting prevail—for Christmas has come again!—Katherine Edelman.

Helping Santa Claus —Assistants Needed

HER children had had such a jolly Christmas. Their joy and delight had been a joy and delight to see. But that Christmas afternoon she heard of a story that saddened her. A little girl and a little boy had gathered a tree from the woods and had left it for Santa Claus to trim.

Eagerly Christmas morning they had gone down stairs to see the tree, but it was just as they had left it. Santa Claus had not come, and they had followed all the rules they had been told about calling up the chimney to him.

Their family were both poor and lacking in imagination. Struggle and ill health had driven any lurking imagination from them.

So she went that evening, her arms laden with tree decorations and odds and ends of candles and toys and asked if she might trim the tree. The next morning the children were told that Santa Claus had not forgotten them—he had had to dash over to the next town to do so much that he had been delayed. Santa Claus needs his assistants and no job in the world is much more fun than that of being an assistant to Santa Claus.—Mary Graham Bonner.

Santa Claus' Sugar Plums

By Mary Graham Bonner

IT HAD always been such a nice, deceptive way in which to speak of specially delicious and delectable sweets—sugar plums.

Her grandmother had called candies and candied fruits and luscious bonbons "sugar plums." And she had always, because she liked candied fruits so particularly, called them "sugar plums."

It had been seventeen years since Rose had first remembered hearing of "sugar plums." She had been three then, and her grandmother had said in the wise, wise way that grandmother always had of knowing what was what, "Yes, only Santa Claus knows how to get the choicest of sugar plums."

Rose Had Been Very Busy Getting Ready for Christmas.

Rose was very busy getting ready for Christmas. It was a busy time in the family. There were mince pies to be made and plum puddings, and almonds to salt, and fudge to make, and wreaths to make, and bells to tie, and fresh candles to put in the candle-sticks—red candles at this time of the year.

It was a time for general cheer, and from Rose's family a great share of this cheer went forth.

It was not that they were wealthy. They were, in fact, the opposite.

But it was their great satisfaction that by hard work and great energy of spirit they could do a great deal in a small way for every one with whom they came in contact at this season of the year.

Every present, no matter how simple, was prettily wrapped. There was no condescension in their giving. To them it was a big part of their Christmas delight that they knew so many people with whom they could share their Christmas sacrifices and the result of the late hours they kept for weeks before Christmas in their innumerable small preparations. Saving was always such fun throughout the early autumn. Of what fun was saving if it were all to be forever hidden?

There were two presents awaiting Christmas morning for Rose to unwrap. They were for her and she had taken them in when they had arrived, but she had not opened them.

She was curious about these presents. She knew they would be quite simple, but one was from Billy and one was from Joe, and both Billy and Joe had lately been running a race, as it were, for Rose's acceptance of engagements, for her favors.

She liked Billy much better than she did Joe. She knew that Billy liked her. She knew that Joe liked her, too. She felt that Joe would always make her very comfortable, would always be very kind, very dutiful, and that she would always have to be dutiful, too.

Of course, that was all right. But she felt that with Billy she would want to make him so very happy, and with Joe, that it would be so much more of a duty.

Yet Joe was more reliable, he was less irresponsible, less spontaneous, and so much more exact. But Billy was such a dear!

She could label all Joe's good points. Billy's were less tangible, but they were there, all right, even if she couldn't name them.

She helped her mother with the last Christmas Eve touches, covered the fire over with ashes, put out the lights and finally went to bed.

The next morning she opened Joe's present first. Somehow she wanted to keep Billy's to the last, the way she had done with things when she was a child.

There was a little note with Joe's present, telling her what she knew he had been wanting to tell her for a long time—how much he thought of her, what a good wife he knew she would be—of that, he said, he was confident. And he hoped she would be of the same opinion about him. He would make her, he was quite sure, a good husband.

Then there was a word about the present. He had not known what to give her this year; he knew she had all of those things which, as their positions now were, were the only things he could give her, but his mother had suggested a very complete sewing box.

There was no note with Billy's present. Just a card upon which he had written:

"I think you like these 'sugar plum' things. Merry Christmas." It was a wholly unreasonably large box of candied fruit.

Later Billy himself came around. What a dear he was! Oh, yes, Billy

"Crazy Present I Gave You," Billy Was Saying.

was a dear. And they had mistletoe, too, and Billy was grabbing her and was saying:

"Crazy present I gave you, but I know you like sugar plums; and, anyway, I had in mind a diamond ring, but just thought I'd speak to you about it first."

Billy had his own ideas. "Sugar plums." Joe had consulted his mother and there had been a sewing box. Oh, she couldn't tell just why, perhaps, but she did love Billy and she didn't love Joe. Perhaps it was because Billy was just a dear.

"The 'sugar plums' win," she said, and I'd love the diamond ring."

Billy didn't quite understand the first part of her sentence, but he did the last—and, after all, that was all that was necessary!

Not Too Late for Merry Christmas

Trip Home From Dance and a Hard Jolt for Russwin and Caroline.

By ELEANOR E. KING

THE moon rose clear and bright over a freshly snow-laden world. It was the evening of the big Christmas dance at the Trunketville town hall, an event in which old and young all over the countryside participated, a night remembered throughout the year, and anticipated long before its arrival.

The couples fairly flew around the hall, some sprily, others not quite so nimbly. Nevertheless, there was an heroic effort about it that was appealing, to say the least. The last strains of music died away promptly as the clock struck twelve. 'No newfangled ideas about these all-night dances won favor in this town.

As the couples filed out of the hall, Caroline and Russwin were the last to leave. Arm in arm, apparently sufficient unto themselves, deeply engrossed in an all-absorbing conversation, they approached a small car parked near the hall. Russwin opened the door of the machine and helped Caroline in. Closing the door he seated himself at the wheel and soon they were off down the road.

"Engine's a little cold," apologized Russwin as the car alternately coughed and choked, getting up speed. "That was a great dance. Always seems so good to see all the old college fellows back home. I never regret my four years, even if I did have to leave you. Yes," laughingly he slipped his arm around Caroline as she nodded her assent.

Suddenly a car with glaring headlights came around the bend in the road, blinding Russwin's eyes. Trying to avoid hitting the approaching car which was coming at high speed, he turned out some little distance. Almost before he knew what had happened the car was sliding down the slippery snowbank. It landed in the bottom of the ditch, and with a great lunge turned onto its side.

Caroline caught at Russwin's strong arm. She uttered not a sound, but gradually, as the car turned, her grasp relaxed and she formed merely a limp little heap along with seat cushions and other accessories which all tumbled into a pile on the inside of the car.

Russwin's only thought was of Caroline. She made no reply to Russwin as he endeavored to free her. He wondered if she had been made unconscious by the awful jolt, or killed outright.

He heard the whir of an approaching car. Exerting his remaining strength, terror-stricken, he yelled:

"Stop!"

"What's the matter here?" came two husky voices.

"Give me a lift; break the top or do something to get this girl out."

With the help of the two men Russwin and Caroline were extricated and they were speeding Caroline to the nearest hospital.

The doctors, after examination, and what seemed to Russwin untold time, pronounced Caroline uninjured and attributed her unconscious state to merely fright.

Russwin, gathering her in his arms tenderly whispered: "Caroline, it was a hard jolt, but I guess we still are due for our Merry, Merry Christmas."

"THE more I think about it the less I like the idea of having two outsiders at our Christmas dinner. Of course, mother, I can see how, on the spur of the moment, you told Ruth to invite them—two strangers in a large city with no place to go—it would prey on your sympathies."

"They were given to understand that it was a family dinner when they were invited. They are friends of one of the members of our family, Mary, and out of courtesy to that person I think it is the least we can do to entertain them." With that remark the subject was dropped, and both Mrs. Mathews and her daughter went on about their work in preparation for the coming event.

The great day dawned upon a house decorated with Christmas tree, wreaths, holly and mistletoe, and occupied by two busy, enthusiastic persons. As one o'clock drew near the family began to arrive. This was one day in the year that Mrs. Mathews had the pleasure of seeing all her children and their families together. Among the first to make their appearance was Ruth, her mother, and the two young men, Eddey and Ross, who were to share in the families' Christmas rally.

"The boys reached our house soon after breakfast. From that time on they nagged us to get started. They were so afraid that they were going to miss the grand Christmas dinner that was in store for them. Here we are. Have we missed it?" Ruth laughingly explained as she introduced the boys to the assembled group.

Eddey, tall, slender and dark, had a decidedly eastern accent. Ross, however, was somewhat shorter and more square-built. Instead of being an easterner, he had been born and reared in the Middle West. One wondered that such a strong friendship could thrive between two such contrasting characters as these. Eddey was a dancer by profession, Ross was a singer. Ross had not been in the house more than an hour when he sat down at the piano and began to play very softly. He continued for a little while when some one suggested that he sing. Thus putting himself and the family at ease with his sociable manner, by the time the dinner was served the family no longer felt stilted or restricted by the presence of these strangers in their midst. Eddey and Ross were most versatile in their praise of the dinner. Their actions showed that they were thoroughly enjoying the home cooking. They were quick to make it known verbally. They ate until they were ashamed to admit their capacity for such excellent food.

After dinner Ross was urged to sing again. He persuaded or rather insisted that Eddey assist him with his tenor voice. They made a great pair. They kept the party going. Their entertainment was decidedly successful. Their happy countenances could not help but contagiously radiate to the ones surrounding them.

Mary met her mother going into the kitchen to prepare supper. "Mother, aren't they grand? What would we have done without Eddey and Ross? They have simply made the day."

"Yes," said Mrs. Mathews, "and all because they have been so exceedingly happy to be here."

"Merry Christmas, Happy New Year!"

By Ellis Parker Butler, —in St. Nicholas

LITTLE cullud Rastus come a-skippin' down the street,
A-smilin' an' a-grinnin' at every one he meet;
My, oh! he was happy! Boy! but he was gay!
Wishin' "Merry Christmas" an' "Happy New Year's Day"!
Wishin' that his wishes might every one come true—
And bless your dear heart, honey,—I wish the same to you!

PARKER ATTENDED STATE MEET

REPRESENTED LOCAL TENNIS CLUB AT GRAND RAPIDS

Was Elected to Board of Directors—Placing of Western Michigan Event Still Unsettled

The Western Michigan Tennis Association held an important meeting at the Kent County Club, Grand Rapids, Monday. W. G. Parker, local veteran, represented the city and the tennis interest generally. Before leaving he had talked at length with Mayor Bergeon, Fred Cartier, Archie Livingston and others, all of whom expressed themselves as whole heartedly behind the game here.

Mayor Bergeon praised the work done by the local organization in putting on the two very successful tournaments of the past years, at the same time making several valuable suggestions in respect to advertising, handling the galleries, etc. He expressed appreciation of the support given locally.

Harold Cartier, the genial and hustling tournament manager of the past events, is now located in New York City and his invaluable services are not being considered for 1927. Livingston and Parker will doubtless be in charge, but will be assisted by a city representative during the week of play.

The Grand Rapids meeting was entirely successful and clearly demonstrated that, in spite of the inroads of golf, the game is being well handled throughout the state. After the usual routine business present officers were re-elected, W. G. Parker being elected to a place on the board of directors.

The important question of state championship tournaments was then discussed. It seems that the Detroit Tennis Club's property has increased in value to about half a million. This land was purchased for a small sum a few years ago. Many members have retired from the game but of course holding their memberships. As a result the game dragged somewhat for several years there, but now is in excellent hands. Their tournaments last year were praised.

If Detroit takes the state championship, it is probable Grand Rapids will put on the Western Michigan event. However, it seems probable Detroit will again receive the national clay court championship, in which event Charlevoix will again get the Western Michigan. This was definitely decided in friendly spirit by Muskegon representatives following a talk by Mr. Parker.

SEVENTH GRADERS HAVE XMAS PARTY

Invited Parents and Friends to Enjoy Affair With Them

The boys and girls of the seventh grade gave a fine Christmas program in their room in the high school building Wednesday afternoon and entertained their parents and friends.

A large Christmas tree, provided by the boys of the class, stood in one corner of the room loaded with gifts and beautiful decorations. After the program Santa Claus found gifts on the tree for each member of the class, and the instructor, Walter Alexander, was remembered with a fine gift from the pupils. It was a very happy occasion for the seventh graders and their guests.

JOHN LAKE TO TALK BEFORE MEN'S CLUB

Fine Supper and Orchestra Selections On Program Neat Monday

Mr. John Lake of Petoskey, much in demand as a Rotary and Kiwanis club speaker, will give the address at the men's club next Monday evening at the Methodist Episcopal church.

An excellent supper is planned for seven o'clock and the orchestra will be part of the program. Great interest is being shown in these weekly gatherings for men each Monday evening and a general good time is enjoyed.

McCann Takes Mail Run.

John McCann of St. James who recently moved to Charlevoix for the winter, has received a temporary authorization from the postal department in Washington, to carry the mail to St. James. He made his first trip to the island Tuesday and will continue the run as long as ice conditions permit.

After Santa's Visit

CHRISTMAS is a time of secrets,
So I'll whisper one to you,
Grandpa says that all who try it,
Find that every word is true,
"Would you have a happy day?
Give some happiness away."

Grandpa says this little secret
Should be carried through the year,
And if all would try to heed it,
Earth would soon be full of cheer,
"Would you have a happy day?
Give some happiness away."

BRADY BUILDING MORE FAST ONES

Expects Them to Show Their Heels in Regatta Next Summer

Roy Brady is building two hydroplane type boats for outboard motors at his shop which promise to "show their heels" to other boats of this type in the races next summer.

The boats are being built according to the specifications of the Johnson Brothers Motor Company's 14-foot hydroplane, which last summer at Milwaukee, made a world's record of 26 miles per hour for outboard motors. When completed the total weight, not including motor, will be about 60 pounds. Frames are built of spruce, and planking of West Virginia white cedar, and each peice is glued before fastening with screws. An aluminum fin on the bottom keeps the boats from skidding sideways when making a turn.

These boats will undoubtedly be quite an attraction in the outboard motor races in next summer's regatta.

Cheboygan Happy Over Building

Cheboygan is happy over completion of her new postoffice building. The building was finished and officially occupied last Saturday. It is said the place was erected and equipped to meet all demands of a city of 35,000 people. A. R. Gerow is postmaster.

VESPER SERVICE WAS ENJOYED LAST SUNDAY

Fine Musical Program Rendered at Methodist Episcopal Church

An unusually fine vesper service was enjoyed by a large and appreciative audience at the Methodist church last Sunday afternoon at 4:15. The following program was carried out with great success.

Orchestra.
Hymn.
Scripture.
Anthem, "And There Were Shepherds."
Prayer.
Anthem, "O Night of Holy Memory."
Sermon, "No Room in the Inn."
Duet, Mrs. Maude Gouse, Mrs. Gertrude Block.
Offertory, Orchestra.
Pagent, "The Angel's Message of Christmas."
Hymn, Orchestra.

The pageant was an exquisite delineation of Nativity, and was highly appreciated by those attending the service.

Home Talent Play

A home talent play under the auspices of the Ladies Aid Society of the Methodist church, is scheduled for January 11th. An especially fine program is being arranged. Further announcements will be made later.

C. H. S. TAKES TWO IN A ROW

BOYS TRIMMED GAYLORD HERE LAST FRIDAY NIGHT.

Both Boys and Girls Team Take Ellsworth's Measure in Game Here Tuesday Night.

After getting away to a bad start by losing in successive games to Bellaire and Ellsworth, Charlevoix high school's basketball team staged a come-back and trimmed the Gaylord team here last Friday evening by the score of 9 to 12.

Charlevoix took the lead at the beginning of the game when Marshall sank a basket early in the first quarter, and kept a small margin to their favor throughout the game. Numerous fouls called on the local boys almost spelled defeat, as Gaylord made their entire nine points from free throws. Higman was the outstanding star for the Red and White, scoring 10 of their 12 points. Smith, center, and Novak, guard, new men on the squad, surprised fans by their excellent playing.

On Tuesday evening of this week, both the boys and girls teams avenged their early in the season defeat at the hands of Ellsworth by winning both games by a decisive score.

The first game was a complete walkaway for the girls. Ruth Boyer and Bessie Murphy, Charlevoix's forwards, piled up a 15 to 2 score against their opponents and had the game on the ice from the opening quarter.

The Ellsworth boys gave Charlevoix plenty to worry about early in the first quarter outplaying the local five. A substitution, Beaudoin for Marshall, smoothed out the offense and Charlevoix soon piled up a commanding lead, with Beaudoin leading the scoring. Ellsworth came back fighting in the second half but could not overcome the lead against them.

Ellsworth gave the Red and White more trouble than did Gaylord last Friday. They have a snappy, fast team, and the result of the game speaks well for the improvement in the local squad since the early encounters of the season. In Novak and McCann, Coach Buchen has two excellent guards. Beaudoin led the scoring in last night's game and was well supported by Higman, Marshall and Smith.

Coach Art Wells of East Jordan, refereed.

ICE RINK PROVES A POPULAR ATTRACTION

Crowded Each Evening With Kiddies and Grown-Ups

As in former years, the skating rink provided by the city on the school grounds is a center of attraction for the young folks of the city as well as a great number of grown-ups.

Nights after school and evenings has found the rink crowded with jolly skaters and parents feel assured that their children may enjoy the sport here safe from the dangers always present on the lakes as the rink is under constant supervision of some capable person. Rumors are current relatives to the organization of a hockey club and the rink will likely prove more popular as the winter advances.

TAX SURPLUS BELONGS TO THE TAXPAYERS

It is regretable that there seems to be such a wide divergence in Washington on the question of tax revision, and that an agreement at the present session is unlikely. It is not necessary that such an agreement should definitely decide for revenue revision at this session, but rather that there should be a general understanding ns to its scope and the time when it can be best put into effect. The danger in the situation, ns we see it, is the pressure which is developing to take advantage of the disagreement as to the method of distribution of surplus to the taxpayers by bringing abont a recrudescence of pork barrel expenditures. Whatever the amount of surplus is or may be, the fact remains thnt it is excess taxes collected from the people. When the revenue hill now on the statute books was enacted, it was estimated that there would be no surplus, and because of that estimate certain taxes were continued in effect and the reduction of the income tax was not made as great as it might have been. Time has shown that these estimates were wrong and a heavy surplus has accumulated. This money belongs to the taxpayers and not to consumers of political pork throughout the country. We have no opinion to express as to whether Mr. Coolidge's rebate, Mr. Mellon's credit or the Democratic comprehensive plan of revision is the best. We feel however, that every corporation in the country and every individual paying taxes should take a firm position against turning the surplus into the public buildings or rivers and harbors sink-holes which are always in the minds of some politicnlly-minded gentlemen.

ONLY CREDIT ASKED

If a newspaper should publish current gossip, or hints and allusions of the best society in the community it would oe ostracised and the editor horsewhipped or burned at the stake. Think a minute of the mean and low things you say about your townsmen and your neighbors and imagine how it would look in print. Don't criticise the newspapers for whnt they print, but give them great credit for what they don't print. A newspnper that contnined one-half the nonsense current among the best citizens would be considered unfit to rend. Honest!

GREATER BUYING POWER

According to the National City Bank, of New York, two things have contributed chiefly to the expansion of industry over the past few years: the mnking up of the normal peacetime growth that wns retarded by the World war and a great increase in industrial efficiency which has produced a wider distribution of wealth here thnn anywhere else. This industrinl efficiency has given to the mnss of people a buying power greater than that of any other country. The National City Bank says:

"The wants of the American people are no nearer to being satisfied nov than they were a year ngo or five years ago, nor is there the slightest prospect that they will be satisfied in the near future. The buying power of the American people exists in the work they do for each other from day to day nnd is as limitless as their wants. The pace at which they make headway in satisfying their own and each other's wants depends upon their ability to work together harmoniously, understanding all the time the co-operative chnracter of their relations. The secret of continued prosperity is in n fair and even distribution of it. Whenever a group attempts to get more than its share, the entire flow is imperiled."

ONE BASIS FOR OUR OPTIMISM

Those who travel throughout the United States extensively are imbued with an optimism which is astounding to the stay-at-homes. That optimism is not based so much on the more or less obvious prosperity of the country or on its future greatness in a purely political way, but rather because of the fact that there is steadily growing a spirit of understanding among the people of our various sections. In the old days it was comparatively easy to set the farmers against the bankers, and to stir up strife between the agricultural and industrial sections and to utilize labor union propaganda to blacken the employers. In fact, sectionalism was both obvious and provoking. Today there is a broader point of view with the result that the East is closer to the Middle West, and the problems of the South nre known in the North, and the South feels little of the old antagonism to those above the Mason and Dixon line. Certainly not all of the old feelings have been wiped out, but with the progress of understanding their ultimate elmination is a certainty. This has been brought about by wider rending, by an interchange of speakers, and by the inevitable economic influence of trade nnd business relations. It is a situation that is most henrtening.

A GREAT BLESSING

Those who listen nightly to the wonderful concerts sent by radio from New York City and many other large cities in the United States must concede that the rndio is one of the greatest discoveries in the recent years. To sit comfortably in an easy chair in the warmth of one's own home and listen to programs by some of the world's greatest nrtists is certainly the height of real comfort and luxury. Do we appreciate the times in which we live or do we accept some of the present conveniences ns those of the commonplace? Even the most isolate farm home may have its radio and is no longer shut off from the outside world. They may hear the latest in song, plays and news just as readily as those who live in the thickly settled communities. It is a grent blessing. Statistics show that one out of every six furmers in the country now has a radio set and a good one.

ELIMINATING THE DEMAGOGUE

We shall write the demise of the demagogue in our country when there are closer knit relations between all the sections. The demagogue thrives on ignorance which he fnns into antngonism by false pretense. The farmers of this country have suffered time and again from a too ready belief in the stntements of men designedly using them to promote their own fortunes. We have had, too, the demagogue in industry who blackened industrial relations deeply and tried to set the workers against the employers in every possible way. There was the labor union business agent and his political brother who wanted to capitalize the trouble which was being instigated. The demagogue in politics or in any other line is a memnce. Understanding is the one thing which he fears may destroy him.

FRESHENING BREEZES

Queen Marie had no sooner arrived home when the royal palace was destroyed by fire. Well, that ain't the first instance when the old homestead broke into fiames the day after a fellow's wife got home from her vacation.

Judging from the way the Democrats are startlng senatorial investigations, one is apt to get the impression that only the Republicans are sharing in this present-day prosperity.

What has become of the old-fashioned housewife who ust to knit a few pairs of socks for Christmas along about this time of the year.

It hns just developed that Governor-elect Fred W. Green waged the most unique political campaign in history. Not once did the Ioninn promise to reduce taxes.

NORWOOD

Glen Holecheck of Flint, is home.

A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Miss Anna Jones visited at the Holecheck home Sunday.

Elmer Sprick of Flint, spent the week end with friends at Norwood.

Mrs. Julia Carmen is spending a few days with her friends, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Richardson.

Remember the Christmas exercises at the M. E. church in Norwood Friday evening, December 24th.

Miss Joyce Mayne, who is attending school at Kalamazoo, is spending her Christmas vacation with parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Mayne.

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Ypma motored up from Grand Rapids last Saturday and brought with them their radio, and are enjoying a very pleasent vacation with Mrs. Ypma's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Chas Greeley.

The wide-spread storm that swept down from Alaska, struck this locality quite forceably last Monday night causing our roads to be blocked so that R. F. D. men had to turn back, but Friday the sun spread its beautiful rays down on us and all was well. The tempature bas moderated and automobles are traveling again.

MOUNTAIN SCHOOL NOTES

Two weeks Christmas vacation. Hurrah!

Jim Wilson come home for the week end.

Most everybody in this community was shopping in Boyne City, Saturday.

Have you noticed the smile on Mr. Hosegood's face? Its because Santa will soon be here.

Esther Case of Charlevoix, spent the week end visiting her mother at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Bert Staley.

The Mountain School will have their Christmas tree and program on Thursday night, instead of Friday as planned.

Some of our boys have been quite successful in fishing thru the ice landing as many as fifteen nice trout in one afternoon.

The Wilson family royally entertained Mrs. Case and daughter Esther and the Messers. Ernest and Clare Staley, to a bounteous supper on Friday night.

On Thursday evening Mr. and Mrs. Bert Staley entertained Mr. and Mrs. George Staley and family and Ernest Staley to a six o'clock dinner in honor of their son, Clare's birthday. The chief attraction of the table was a beautiful birthday cake, decorated with sixteen candles. The evening was spent in listening to good music and playing pedro. Clare and his teacher succeeded in carrying off all the honors in the card games.

EVELINE

We wish everybody a Merry Christmas.

R. H. Sherman was in Charlevoix Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. Will Walker were in Charlevoix Saturday.

Mrs. Ole Neilsen arrived home from Chicago, Saturday, with Thomas. He is feeling better.

Ole Santa will soon be here to see us all. There is going to be a Christmas tree and program at the Walker school Thursday evening. Everybody welcome.

"PAWNEE BILL" AND HIS SHOPWORN TIES

Such Back-numbers That Editors Turn Them Down

It is very seldom an editor turns down a proposition that will bring in a dollar or save a cent. But here is a case where ye ed. has become very indignant and refused to accept an offered bargain. Possibly if he had accepted the proposition, the article would have detracted from his beauty and appearance. Some editors are fussy about their neckwear. We are ourselves, and our sympathies are with the writer of the following, who also returned a bunch of "Pawnee Bill's" ties. The editor of the Cheboygan Democrat is responsible for the following outburst. The ties appealed to him as they did to us.

"The editor along with about every other person in the city received a swath of neckties from "Pawnee Bill" last week which we are expected to keep and send friend "Bill' a remittance of $1.50. Our package of ties must be back to the home shop by this time, not only because they were not the kind of ties the editor sports, (the Little Lord Fontleroy kind being our preference,) but we believe in buying our neckties of the home necktie venders. Just to satisfy ourselves whether "Pawnee Bill' was losing money on his venture or not even if only a small percentage of the people to whom he sent ties ever returned them or the money to pay for them, we snooped around our home stores a bit and found that we could buy the same brand of ties for less money than he was asking us to send him. We found that we could buy an equally as good and nice looking tie made of same materials and same weave and texture and weight for ten cents each, and "Bill" was asking us to send him 25 cents each for the bunch he sent us and besides who ever wanted six neckties on hand at once; Cheboygan fellows were not the only ones on "Pawnee Bill's" mail list. He must send out hundreds of thousands of such packages all over the world, and the suckers must fall for the bait as he has been sending these packages for some time now. This being the fourth time we have been remembered in the past two years. Along with the ties is a form letter stating the recipient has a choice of keeping and paying for the neckwear or returning it to 'Pawnee Bill.' The ties come from St. Louis, Mo."

AT THE MOVIES

Lue Tellegen Has Fine Role in "Silver Treasure"

Lue Tellegen, known the world over for his romantic characterizations with Sarah Barnhardt and Eleanor Duse, has ample opportunity to prove his versatility in "The Silver Treasure," William Fox screen version of Joseph Conrad's famous novel "Nostromo," which opens at the Palace Theatre next Thursday and Friday.

Corinne Griffith in New Screen Hit

A new Corinne Griffith—an amazingly saucy creature, with pep and impudence fairly exuding from every pore!

The stately and demure and essentially cultivated personality known as Corinne Griffith on the screen has undergone such transformation. And, if wondering admirers who read these lines still doubt, let them go to the Palace Theatre Wednesday and see for themselves. Which they undoubtedly will do in any case.

Comedy Team's Second Screen

Adolphe Menjou may remain Uncle Sam's suave sophisticate, Harold Lloyd should keep on as America's perennial playboy, Jack Holt can continue upholding the honor of the west, Bebe Daniels may well stay on as Hollywood's joyful tomboy but—as for Wallace Berry and Raymond Hatton—let them continue to be the screen's funniest comedy team, in films similar to 1926's fun fest, "Behind the Front."

Paramount officials realized the public demand for a sequel to the first "sunny side of the war" picture and cast about for another good story. Monty Brice, adaptor of the earlier production, handed in an original script, which upon being read caused everyone to fall into convulsions of laughter. It's name? "We're in the Nnvy Now."

And so—the picture which arrives at the Palace Theatre Saturday and Sunday traces the lives of a prize fighter and his manager from the day they innocently join the Navy till their final return to the ring.

May the spirit of Christmas hoover around and over us as we think of the Blessed Star of Hope which came to the world to lighten mortal hearts. That which appeared to the wise men of the east and bore recollection of that notable event. Of the memorable scene when the heavenly host appeared to those frightened shepherds singing the good news. "Glory to God in the Highest and on Earth. Peace and tidings to men," may the peace of the Lord and Savior abide at the doors of our hearts and emit consolation, happiness and joy to those who may be burdened with sorrow and grief. For he is our only hope and consolation.

CHAPTER XVI

The Military Hop

Margery, for the first month or so, was silent and kept as close as possible to Lydia's apron strings. But no girl as beautiful as she was could be kept in Coventry long and though she refused for a time to go to parties, it was not long before Margery was taking tramps with the college boys and joining happily enough in the simple pleasures at the cottage.

Lydia did not hear from Kent until a week before the first college hop, late in October. Then she received a formal note from him, reminding her of his invitation.

"Oh, Lyd!" exclaimed Margery, "aren't you lucky! I haven't seen Kent or heard from him since our trouble!"

"Neither have I," said Lydia. "And I suspect he's so cross with me that he hates to keep this engagement. But I don't care. I wish I had a new dress. But I've made the sleeves small in my organdie and made a new girdle. It looks as well as could be expected!" she finished comically.

The hop was a success, a decided success, in spite of the organdie. Kent was inclined to be stiff, at first, and to wear a slightly injured air, and yet, mingled with this was a frank and youthful bravado. And there could be no doubt that among the college boys, Kent was more or less of a hero. It was something to boast of, evidently, to have one's name coupled with Levine's in the great scandal.

Kent had supposed that he would have some trouble in filling Lydia's card for her, but to his surprise, he found that in her timid way, Lydia was something of a personage among the older college boys and the younger professors.

It was altogether an intoxicating evening and at its end Lydia pulled on her last winter's overcoat and clambered into Kent's little automobile, utterly satisfied with life.

"Oh, Kent, it was wonderful!"

"And you don't feel as if I were a villain any more? You've forgiven me?"

"Forgiven you? For what?"

"For not agreeing with you on the Indian question. Gee, I was sore at you, Lyd, that morning at the hearing, and yet I was like your dad. I was proud of you, too."

"Oh, don't let's talk about it, tonight, Kent," Lydia protested.

"All right, old girl, only just remember that I can't change. I back Mr. Levine to the limit. And maybe he hasn't a surprise party coming for all of you!"

"I don't care," insisted Lydia. "I'm going to be happy tonight, and I won't talk Indians. Margery is feeling much better. She's at our house every Sunday. You must come round and see her!"

"Why shouldn't I come to see you, Lydia?" asked Kent, with a new note in his voice.

"Why, of course, you'd see me, but Margery's always been the main attraction with you."

"Has she? Seems to me I recall a time when I couldn't endure the sight of her. And when you were the best pal I had. That's what you are, Lydia, a real pal. A fellow can flirt round with the rest of 'em, but you're the one to look forward to spending a lifetime with! Tomorrow's Sunday. Let's take a walk down to the Willows in the afternoon."

"All right, Kent," said Lydia, quietly, and silence fell on both of them till they drew up at the cottage gate.

For some reason, when she woke the next morning, Lydia half hoped that the soft patter against her window was of rain drops. But it was the wind-tossed maple leaves, whose scarlet and gold were drifting deep on the lawn and garden. At three o'clock Lydia and Kent set off down the road to the Willows.

They strolled along the leafy road, with the tang of the autumn in their nostrils, and the blue gleam of the lake in their eyes. It was only a half mile to the Willows and as they turned in, Kent took Lydia's hand and drew it through his arm.

"Look," he said, "I believe there is even a little left of our cave, after all this time. What a rough little devil I was in those days. And yet, even then, Lyd, I believe I had an idea of trying to take care of you."

He dropped Lydia's hand and faced her. "Lydia, do you care for me—care for me enough to marry me?"

Lydia turned pale. Something in her heart began to sing. Something in her brain began to stir, uncomfortably.

"Oh, Kent," she began, breathlessly, then paused and the two looked deep into each other's eyes.

"Lydia! Lydia! I need you so!" cried Kent. "You are such a dear, such a pal, so pretty, so sweet—and I need you so! Won't you marry me, Lydia?"

"I've always loved you dearly, Kent, and yet," faltered Lydia, "and yet, somehow, I don't think we'd ever make each other happy."

"Not make each other happy! I'd like to know why not! Just try me, Lydia! Try me!"

"I'd like to try you, dear if— Wait, Kent, wait! Let me have my playtime, Kent. I've never had a real one, you know, till now. Let me finish college, then ask me again, will you, Kent?"

Kent jerked his head discontentedly. "I think it would be better for us to tie to each other right now. Please, Lydia dear!"

Lydia shook her head slowly. "Let me have my playtime, Kent. I don't know that side of myself at all."

Kent looked into the clear tender blue of Lydia's eyes. Then he said softly, "All right, dear! You know best. But will you give me just one kiss—for remembrance?"

"Yes," replied Lydia, lifting her face, and Kent pulled off his cap and kissed the warm, girlish lips, tenderly, lingeringly, then, without a word, gently turned Lydia homeward.

Kent's announcement that he had broken with Billy Norton did not amount to a great deal. As winter came on, he and Billy met constantly at the cottage and, outwardly at least, were friendly. The commission finished its sitting and turned its findings over to congress. Congress instructed the district attorney to carry the matter to the state courts. When this had been done all the incriminated heaved a vast sigh of relief, and prepared to mark time.

During all Lydia's junior year, but one fly appeared in her ointment. And this, of course, was with reference to clothes! that perennial haunting problem of Lydia's, which only a woman who has been motherless and poverty-stricken can fully appreciate. The latter part of February, the great college social event of the year was to come, the junior prom. Lydia felt sure that either Kent or Billy would ask her to go and for this the organdie would not do. And for this she must have a party coat.

Lydia knew if she took the matter up with Amos he would go out and borrow money for her. She shuddered at the thought of this. Then she heard of the "College Money-Making Bureau." She discovered that there were girls who were earning their way through college and that the bureau was one of the quiet ways used by the university to help them.

There was the mending department for example. Here were brought every week by the well-to-do students piles of mending of every variety from heelless socks and stockings, to threadbare underwear and frayed cuffs and collars. These were made into packages and farmed out to the money-needing girls.

Early in January, Lydia sneaked into the little room and out again with a neat but heavy bundle. She got home with it and smuggled it into her room without old Lizzie's seeing it. Socks, wristbands and torn lace—there was fifty cents' worth of mending in the package! Lydia calculated that if she did a package a night for thirty nights, she would have enough money to buy the making of the party dress and cloak.

The necessity for secrecy was what made the task arduous. Lydia finished her studying as hurriedly as possible each night and went off to her room. It was bitter cold in the room when the door was closed, but she hung a dust cloth over the keyhole, a shawl over the window, shuddered, wrapped herself in a quilt and unwrapped the bundle. By two o'clock she had finished and shivering and with aching eyes, crept into bed.

Within a week she was going about her daily work with hollow eyes and without the usual glow in her cheeks but she hung on with determination worthy of a better cause.

The third week she took cold, an almost unheard-of proceeding for Lydia, and in spite of all old Lizzie's decoctions, she could not throw it off. At the end of the fourth week she carried back her last bundle, and with fifteen dollars in her pocketbook she hoarded the street car for home. She was trembling with fatigue and fever.

When she reached the cottage, she stretched out on the couch behind the old base burner with her sense of satisfaction chilled by her hard cough and the feverish taste in her mouth. She was half asleep, half in a stupor when Billy came in.

"How's the cold, Lyd?" he asked.

"Socks," whispered Lydia, "bushels of socks, aren't there, Billy?"

Billy picked up her hand and felt her pulse, pulled the shawl up over her chest, put his cheek down against her forehead for a moment as he murmured, "Oh, Lydia, don't be sick! I couldn't bear it!" then he hurried to the kitchen where Lizzie was getting supper.

The next thing that Lydia knew she was in her own bed and "Doc" Fulton was taking the clinical thermometer from her mouth. She was very much confused.

"Where's my fifteen dollars?" she asked.

"What fifteen dollars, little daughter?" Amos was sitting on the edge of the bed, holding her hand.

"For my party dress—white mull—with socks—please, daddy."

Amos looked at Lizzie. "It's what she wanted for the junior prom, I guess," said the old lady, "poor child."

"You shall have fifteen dollars, just as soon as you get well, honey," said Amos.

"All right," said Lydia, hoarsely, "tell Kent so's he—" She trailed off again into stupor.

It was a hard pull, a sharp, hard struggle with badly congested lungs, for two weeks. Ma Norton took charge and "Doc" Fulton was there night after night. Margery came every day, with a basket, for Elvira practically fed Amos during the two weeks. Billy did chores. Kent was errand boy with the little car. And Adam sat on the doorstep for hours and howled!

But Lydia was splendidly strong. One night, after ten days of stupor and delirium, she opened her eyes on Amos' haggard face. She spoke weakly but naturally. "Hello, dad! Ask Margery to get me the pattern we were talking about. In a day or so I'll be up and around."

"In a Day or So I'll Be Up and Around."

Amos began to cry for sheer joy.

Once she began to mend, Lydia's recovery was unbelievably rapid. On a

Lydia dug the little pocketbook from under the sofa pillow and spread the money proudly on her shawl. "There it is and it's the rest of all my troubles."

Billy looked at her suspiciously. "Young woman, how'd you earn that money?" he demanded.

"Socks! Bushels of socks, mostly," answered Lydia with a chuckle that ended in a groan. She looked at Billy whimsically and then as the sureness of his understanding came to her again, she told him the story of her little midnight sweatshop.

It seemed for a moment as if he must gather the slight little figure to his heart, but he set his teeth.

"If that darned prom means as much as that to you—" he began, but Lydia interrupted him.

"It doesn't any more, Billy. I've learned a lot of things since I've been sick. I was a little idiot to work so hard for clothes! But I don't think it was all clothes. I wanted to be like other girls. I wanted to have the man that took me proud of my appearance."

The two young people sat in silence, Lydia watching the snowflakes settle on the already overladen boughs of the pine, Billy watching the sensitive lines in Lydia's face change with each passing thought.

"Billy," she said, "what would you say if next year I took the short course in agriculture?"

"I'd be speechless!" he exclaimed.

"I hate to think of teaching," Lydia went on, "and I'm crazy about the country and farming and so is dad. And there's more than that to it."

What more there was to it, she did not say then, for Ma Norton came hustling in.

Sunday, a week before the junior prom, she was able to dress and to lie on the living-room couch. During the afternoon, Kent came in.

"Hello, Lyd!" he cried. "Are you going to go to the junior prom with me, after all?"

"Kent, I can't go. I might be strong enough for one or two dances by that time, but I can't get my clothes done."

"Pshaw, isn't that hard luck! Kent's voice was soft with sympathy. "Never mind, old lady! I'm so darned glad to have you getting well so fast, that the prom doesn't matter. Say, Lyd, Margery's come out fine, since you've been sick! Er—Lydia, don't you think she'd go to the prom with me? Seems to me she's cut out society as long as she needs to."

"I think she ought to go if she wants to," Lydia said.

"Guess I'll ask her now," cried Kent, disappearing kitchenward.

Lydia lay watching snowflakes sift softly past the window. It was not long before Margery and Kent appeared.

"She's going!" cried Kent.

Margery's beautiful eyes were glowing. "Yes, I'm going, Lyd! And if nobody else will dance with me, Kent will take all the dances."

Lydia smiled at Kent.

Billy was the next caller. "I left dad and Amos saving the nation through free trade," he said. "Gee, Lydia, but you do look better! You don't suppose you could possibly go to the prom, just for one or two dances, do you?"

Lydia shook her head. "No clothes," she said, briefly. "Ask some other girl."

"There isn't any other girl," replied Billy. "If I can't go with you, I'll be hanged if I go at all! Lydia, I don't see why a sensible girl like you lays such stress on clothes. Honestly, it's not like you. Come on, be a sport and go in your usual dress, or let me lend you the money to get a complete party outfit with."

"Billy Norton, you know I wouldn't borrow money from a man!" exclaimed Lydia. "Besides, I've got enough money I earned myself!"

Are You "Toxic?"

It Is Well, Then, to Learn the Importance of Good Elimination.

FUNCTIONAL inactivity of the kidneys permits a retention of waste poisons in the blood. Symptoms of this toxic condition are a dull, languid feeling, drowsy headaches and, sometimes, toxic backache and dizziness. That the kidneys are not functioning as they should is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Many readers have learned the value of Doan's Pills, stimulant diuretic to the kidneys, in this condition. Users everywhere endorse Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

PASTOR GIVES RULES FOR WIVES TO LIVE UP TO

A decalogue for women with "Thou shalt not nag" as the first tenet has been drawn up for those who would keep their husbands by Dr. William L. Stidger, pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church of Kansas City, Mo. We do not know how they will appeal to Charlevoix wives, but reproduce them with the hope they will receive due consideration.

Thou shalt not nag.

Thou shalt not give thy thought to dressing wholly.

Thou shalt not be jealous.

Thou shalt not be pugnacious.

Thou shalt attempt to live up to the ideals that have been dreamed for thee.

Thou shalt not expect thy husband to be the cook or the dish washer.

Thou shalt remember that thy home is thy first shrine.

Thou shalt remember that men love good women and cleave to them forever.

Thou shalt set the spiritual note of human life.

Thou shalt be loving and thou shalt have love.

No Rural Mail Christmas

Postmaster George Weaver states there will be no delivery of mail on rural routes on Christmas Day. All mail must be in the postoffice early enough for delivery prior to Christmas, he says, or it will be held over until Monday's delivery. There will be one general city delivery Christmas Day in the city.

MILLING LOSES A DISTINGUISHED FAMILY

Northwestern Miller Comments on Retirement

The Northwestern Miller, a trade paper devoted to this great industry, comments as follows on the retirement of the Plant family, well known Charlevoix summer people:

"The passing from the trade one by one of the fine names long associated with milling is a continuing source of regret to those who cherish the sentiments and traditions of the industry along with regard for its material prosperity. In the most recent instance, that of the retirement of the Plant family, it is true that new owners of the properties are continuing the name, yet this can only be regarded as the shadow of the family indentity. The spirit and the fine and high traditions of nearly a century of direction by father, son and grandson soon will live chiefly as a pleasant memory.

"No name stands higher in the annals of American milling than that of Plant. In the days when St. Louis was the milling capital of the country, it shone resplendent among a score of other names of the older generation of American millers. Founded in 1840 by George P. and Samuel Plant, the business soon became one of the outsanding successes of the then new milling field in the Middle West and of St. Louis, its vigorous center. In later years the management descended to George H. Plant, who continued as president until the sale of the business a week ago."

Roads in Good Shape.

Sunday's snowstorm caused no serious tie-ups on roads out of the city, although the Petoskey route was blocked until Monday forenoon. M-11 south and the Charlevoix-Boyne City roads were both open throughout the storm. The snow fence received last week from the state highway department has been placed and is greatly helping the situation. A regular plow is now on the Bay Shore-Eastport division and officials believe they have snow removal work well in hand.

REVIEW OF LEE ASHTON

LOCAL WRITER PLACES BOOK ON THE MARKET

A Tale of New England and the South from the Pen of Rae Stanley a Book of Merit

Among the books on modernly equipped shelves, Lee Ashton, a tala of New England and the South, from the pen Rae Stanley, the assumed name of the writer, who is a well known Charlevoix resident, will stand out.

The life portrayed in this story is not one belonging to this day of madness for wild amusement and adventure; it is a story of an age, old theme, poverty, ambition and a beautiful love. Lee Ashton is a character living in most every man's life—the spirit of higher achievements and a wider sphere, through friendship and love.

"Lee Ashton" is n story of college life in one of New England's smallest colleges; a story of three young men in whom the germs of ambition are beginning to stir. Jerrold Jordan, our hero, poet nnd dreamer, began the movement and Orvis his hrother (musically inclined) seconded it, while Harry Jackson, an orphan who had drifted into their neighborhood rounded out the trio. The three form a "Labor Party" and set out to earn sufficient money to go to college on.

When they finally enter Cornell University they are instantly met by Lee Ashton, the youngest teacher on the faculty. Due to her high scholastic attainments and her unaffected personality she was, besides being the youngest, the most popular teacher at Cornell.

Throughout Jerrold's first two years at Cornell Lee becomes his confident friend and aid in every way. The friendship existing between these two persons is one most true and beautiful. She inspires him in her every way to the best things of which he is capable and brings confidence to his broadening horizon.

The third year, through some misunderstanding Lee is dismissed from the faculty nnd Jerrold realizes one year of misery and desolation without his beloved Lee's guidance and inspiration. During this year much happens: his brother, Orvis, dies, due to excess stress put on a musical coneert. He and Harry decide to become preachers of the Divine word and thus ends their college careers.

Jerrold spends the two next years studying at a Theologieal college in Boston and working in the slum district. He travels abroad the next two years, after receiving a scholarship from the college. Coming home after these years he again meets Lee on the old intimate terms and the story ends very happily.

Mr. Stanley's book will make its own appeal to real lovers of literature, because it is life told in a lingering quality of realism which is achieved through the imagination. The friendship and love predominant in the story is conceived in the poetic spirit and presented, as in a mirror, almost indirectly, that its poetic truth and reality may be the more direct. It is a book full of shrewd observntions, poetically given, a book for everyone who is stirred by the strange and beautiful in human nature.

METHODIST CHURCH
C. E. Pollock, Minister

MERRY CHRISTMAS TO ALL.

"Christ And The Years," 10.30 a. m.

"The Lost Word," 7:30 p. m.

Both services of worship next Sunday will be of challenging interest to church people. Christmas music of excellence in both services. In the evening the pictures of the Nativity will be shown. A special sermon based on a great reality and illustrater by Van Dyke's narrative "The Lost Word" for this hour.

Christmas tree and Santa Friday evening this week at 8:00 p. m. A wonderful program has been prepnred, and all are expected to enjoy this evening of hallowed tradition and sentiment.

The vesper. servico last Sunday afternoon was a great inspiration to a church full of people. The Christmas spirit was much in evidence. The large picture was highly nppreciated, and the appearance of the angels at just the right moncnt in the picture was rather startling. The public may see the picture again on Friday evening. The choir and orchestra did good work and were highly appreciated.

To the pastor was given the privilege of speaking on "The Meaning Of Christmas" at the Christmas exercises of the high school, on Wednesday afternoon this week.

The men had a tasty supper of chicken pie and the things that usually go with it last Monday evening. The address by Supt. Feurer from Boyne City was greatly enjoyed by the men. Other talks were made by Rev. Burns and editor Usher. Much fun and jollity, and music, song and wit helped to make the evening memorable. The men meet next Monday evening, and another and different program is planned. This is not a denominational affair but is for all men who wish best things.

CHEBOYGAN EDITOR HANDS OUT JOLT

Criticises Neighboring City on Law Enforcement

Emmet county is seemingly our closest neighbors and it's people with a high type of citizenry, but public sentiment there don't seem to run in the same groove it does over here. Take for instance, the men caught violating the liquor law. First it's hard to get the case before the court, then it's another job to get convletion, nnd convictions don't mean as much as they do to the victims picked up here occasionally. In every other fracture of the law, public sentiment seems passive. The latest evidence of this is the case before the last term of circuit [illegible], presided over by Judge Barton of Cadillac. L. G. Grimes, a former [illegible]man of Petoskey, and a widely k[illegible]low was convicted of arson and [illegible]ing of fires laid at his door, wa[illegible]imposing one. He was found guilty nfter he had confessed and [illegible]got three years at Ionia. He hired a fellow to touch the match to one of his latest fires, and the fello[illegible] was one of that kind that could be [illegible]ed to do the job for $10, and that [illegible]low also plead guilty. He was "[illegible]nked on the wrist," and placed on [illegible]bation for a year. It seems the [illegible] thing they're serious about ov[illegible] there is the normal school.—Cheboygan Democrat.

EAST JORDAN HIGH SCHOOL FORGIVEN

Motion Made to Overlook Cancellation of Games

At the last meeting of the Michigan high school athletic board of control at Lansing machinery was set in motion to reinstnte the East Jordan high school, which was barred from all state interscholastic sports for cancelling a regularly contracted football game with the Cheboygan high school.

The board of control at an earlier meeting heard the petition of the East Jordan high school for reinstatement and asked proofs of the good intentions of the school authorities. It was intimated at the time that the commission did not desire to be severe with the offending school but did wish to impress on it the importance of carrying out scheduled athletic activities unless there was a very good reason for asking cancellation.

It is understood that the recent action of the board erases the ban placed against East Jordan and leaves the situation as far as her athletic contest won or lost last fall, in the same position as before the action was taken. East Jordan high school football team won a majority of it's games, taking all of the Class C contests and laid claim to share with Chebaygan the Northern Michigan class C championship.

BAY SHORE MAN WAS FOUND DEAD MONDAY

Funeral Held Wednesday Afternoon From See's Funeral Parlors

Elmer A. Bucher, age 52, was found dead in bed by his wife last Monday morning at their home in Bay Shore.

Mr. Bucher had been a resident of Bay Shore for about five years and his death came as a severe shock to his many friends, who thought him in the best of health. Besids his widow, he is survived by two step-daughters, one step-son, three brothers and two sisters.

Funeral services were held Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock from See's funeral parlors in this city.

Main Street in Fine Shape.

It is with pride that we make the statement that Bridge street; insofar as snow is concerned, is in the best shape that it has been in our memory. The merits of the plan of hauing the snow off the street instead of piling is up in the middle with a scraper speaks for itself. Automobile traffic throughout the winter is no longer a dream, but a reality, and it is well that our main street compares favorably with the country highways.

BUILT UNDER THE COVERT ACT

HALF MILLION HIGHWAY IN MUSKEGON COUNTY

Local Firm Working on Largest Concrete Road Contract Ever Let in the State

Charlevoix should be intensely interested in the half million dollar highway now under construction in Muskegon county, which has, as its sole purpose, the development of a strip of shore land into a profitable summer resort. There are two reasons why this Muskegon county project should interest us. One is, that the road is being built under the Covert Act which has been much discussed—and not a little feared—as a menas of putting a concrete highway around Lake Charlevoix. And the other reason is, that of all methods employed in the development of raw resort lands, the building of good roads offers a greater return in material benefit while it serves to develop a region, and leaves to the community a more intrinsically valuable property when its development purpose has been served, than any other means that could be proposed.

Muskegon county has a stretch of beautiful Lake Michigna shore land lying between North Muskegon and Michillinda. In the main it is strictly raw land, and much of it is practically inaccessible excepting by old lumber roads which offer no attraction to the motorized vacationist. To bring this unknown area to the notice of the public, a group of Muskegon county property owners, availing themselves of the Covert Act, have undertaken the building of 11 miles of 20 foot concrete highway, beginning at the terminus of the 20-foot concrete Memorial Drive in North Muskegon, crossing the Muskegon State Park and extending thence north along Lake Michigan to Michillinda where it connects with the asphalt paved Lake Drive along the south shore of White Lake, to Whitehall. Thus it is accessible at both ends from M-11, and, within a year, it will be ready for the constant stream of motorists who will be diverted from M-11 to view one of the most attractive resort regions imaginable. The property owners who are building this road calculate that its cost will be returned to them many times over in the enchancement of their land values.

Muskegon county is calling its new road a scenic highway. That word "scenic" has been scandalously abused, but here is one instance that justifies its use. The road has been deliberately located, in spite of greatly increased cost, to lead the motorist to amazingly beautiful views of this hidden land. The 20-foot ribbon of concrete will mount easily to the tops of hills that are mountainous in proportion, one in particular rising 249 feet above Lake Michigan and offering land and marine prospects as wide-flung as the eye can span. Elsewhere the right of way emerges suddenly from the leafy tunnel of a deep ravine to the broad, curving sands and marching white breakers of Lake Michigan. At such places, where motorists will constantly halt to admire, wide parking spaces of concreto will be provided, and this is a shrewd foresight, for otherwise, at these points, the pavement would be continually blocked to traffic.

Do not assume that this, like so many of the roads over which we now spin in Michigan, is being financed by the state gasoline tax. It was nothing so easy for the people who wanted it. Owners of the land, who petitioned the road under the Covert Act, will pay for it. They are backing their vision with their money.

The contract was let for this construction June 15, 1926; and the contractors, the Charlevoix Abstract & Engineering Co., whose engineering department has since become through consolidation, The Sloan-Lyons Construction Co., moved in their 8,000,000 pounds of equipment, to begin their job August 19. Men, horses, steam shovels, hoisting engines, tractors, trucks and industrial railways have been busy in the woods ever since. Timber is being felled, stumps yanked out and stacked high, and the grade folluws the path thus struck through the timber, edging lakes, spanning creeks and topping hills or driving through them in mighty cuts.

While the teams make their endless rounds with the wheeled scrapers on the grading along the lower levels, a hoisting engine, far up on the skyline, with bottomless bucket and dragline claws the tops from high hills, to dump its yellow sand freight into the precipitous gullies. Here the steam shovel will follow to finish moving the lesser hills completely into ravines, and making great fills and cuts that will make the soaring climb easy for the swarming motors of years to come. On seeing that hoisting engine tearing away at those heights, you wonder how in the world it ever got to its perch. Does it hoist and lower itself?—for even a caterpillar tractor cannot get to where it has gone, dodging and flattening stumps, panting up steeps and wallowing down again where a man loses his wind with the clumberiag.

It is a man-sized job, this road—the largest single road contract ever let in the state. To make the required cuts, fills and grades, 250,000 cubic yards of earth must be moved by the contractor. Great derrick ships, snaked along by a powerful tug, have transported a huge mound of gravel from the North Fox and South Manitou Islands, away to the northward in Lake Michigan, and piled it on the shore of White Lake at the north end of the job. They have moved 6000 yards of gravel to this point, and with opening of navigation in the spring will resume their trips until they have brought the required to-

CHRISTMAS WEDDING AT C. COOPER HOME

Dr. Virginia Ryall Brown and Jerry Cooley Pledge Marriage Vows

The marriage of Dr. Virginia Ryall Brown, Charlevoix chiropractor, and Jerry Conley, chief engineer of the Grey's Reef lightship, took place on Christmas day, at noon, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Cooper on Ainslee street.

The ring ceremony was preformed by the Rev Bernard G. Mattson, pastor of the First Congregational church of Charlevoix, in the presence of a few immediate friends, the ring being carried in the heart of a rose by little Rosemary Cooper. The bride's gown was of green satin and she carried a beautiful boquet of pink roses. Following the ceremony, a delicious four-course dinner was served with covers laid for seventeen.

The guests included, besides the host and hostess and their small daughter, Mrs. Hattie Cooper and her brother, Thomas Boak; Mr. and Mrs. Rollie L. Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Niver of Boyne City, Mr. and Mrs. F. V. Tyler and daughter, Marian, of Harbor Springs, Rev. and Mrs. B. G. Mattson and Miss Olive Allen.

Amid a shower of rice and good wishes for their future happiness, Mr. and Mrs. Conley left, shortly after dinner, in their car for Grand Rapids, enroute to southern points. After a short honeymoon, they will go to Milwaukee, Wisconsin to spend the remainder of the winter.

STATE DOG TAX LAW HAS TEETH

VIOLATORS SUBJECT TO FINE AND IMPRISONMENT

Charlevoix County Has 174 Dogs Upon Which No License Has Been Paid

Township treasurers have recently been advised by County Treasurer J. W. Flaaders, regarding the collection of dog taxes under the new law. In this issue of the Courier he has also ordered a 20 inch display advertisement, calling attention of dog owners to the new law and the time limit of paying dog taxes.

The new schedule is as follows: If paid before January 10, 1927, taxes on male dogs will be $2.00, unsexed $2.00, female $4.00. If this tax is paid after January 10, 1927, the tax will be $4.00 on male dogs, $4.00 on unsexed dogs, and $6.00 on female dogs. Dog owners should, therefore, arrange to pay their dog tax before January 10 and thus avoid having to pay the higher tax.

According to County Treasurer Flanders, supervisors and assessors of Charlevoix county have reported a total of 1107 dogs in the county for 1926. Up to Saturday of last week taxes have been paid on 933, leaving 174 dogs of various sexes upon which taxes have not been paid, for various reasons, some claiming their dog had died, others offering varying excuses, but a big majority paying no attention to the matter at all.

The total revenue derived from dog taxes so far amounts to $2,350.00, a tidy sum. The remaining dogs upon which no tax has been paid should amount in the neighborhood of near $700.00. We can see no reason why this tax should not be paid. As a matter of fairness, every dog owner should pay, not but a few.

The Michigan dog license law has teeth. The statute provides a fine of $100.00 or thirty days in the county jail, or both. Over 200 criminal warraats are being served on delinquent residents of Emmet county who have violated the dog tax law. In Eaton county over 600 warrants are being served. Other counties in the state are enforcing the law along the same line. So far no pressure has been brought to bear on the delinquent list of dog tax payers in Charlevoix county.

County Treasurer Flanders made his annual report late in September. Instructions from Lansing are that the law, like other criminal laws of Michigan, must be enforced by county peace officers. The tax on these 174 dogs should be paid. The matter should be given the same attention as other laws. If a person is the owner of a dog he should pay the specified tax. If he fails to do this, the law should take its course. This law applies to all and the amount of the unpaid taxes should right now be in the hands of the county treasurer.

XMAS SERVICES WERE BEST EVER

FINE PROGRAM HELD AT CONG. CHURCH LAST SUNDAY

Vesper Service in Afternoon Was Unusually Interesting and Well Rendered

December 26th was celebrated as Christmas Sunday at the Congregational church. At the morning service, Neidlinger's beautiful anthem, "The Birthday of the King," was sung by Mrs. Adams, Mrs. Supernaw, Richard Saltontall and Gilbert Saltonstall. Mrs. Supernaw also sang, "Glory to Heaven's Eternal King" and Raymond Faulkner, pianist, assisted Mrs. Stelter, organist, with the voluntary and offertory. Bernard G. Mattson, Jr., gave a helpful and interesting talk on "The Art of Living" and the pastor preached on "The Crowning of the Year."

The vesper service at 4:15 was of unusual interest. The Cathedral Candle Bearer's processional hymn, "O Come All Ye Faithful," and Mrs. Adams' solo, "Tis the Night of the Dear Savior's Birth," were very effective. The pastor's talk on "Religious Pageantry" and its objective was followed by the production of a pageant of the nativity entitled "The Night of the Star."

Following are the names of the participaats:

Organist, Mrs. Stelter; pianist, Mrs. Swinton; light operator, Ted Cooper; Cathedral Candle Bearers, Jessie Allen, Gwen Geneit, Larue Higman, Bonita Higman, Marie Hardy, Anne Jardine, Georgia Kelderhouse, Clara Kelderhouse, Irene McCann, Myrtle O'Neil, Virginia Parker, Doris Solomon; Reader, Dr. B. G. Mattson; Isaiah, Archie Livingston; Mary, Mrs. Archie Livingston; Joseph, Frazier Mattson; Shepherds, Messrs. Vincent Madison, Louis O'Neil, Clayton Saunders; Wise men, Messers. H. R. Fowler, Richard Saltonstall, Gilbert Saltonstall; Angel of the Star, Miss Helen Mason; other angels, Lola Fessenden, Clair Hardy, Gwen Miller, Hilda Ogden, Mary Parker, Olive Radle, Angie Scott, Eloise Tillotson; Carol singers, Mesdems Adams, Kelderhouse, Lanphear, Mattson, Ogden, Misses Dorothy Dean, Elizabeth Higman and Isabel Mitchell, Messers B. G. Mattson Jr., and F. Wilkinson.

STALEY BROTHERS NEW HARDWARE FIRM

Will Open Store in Emrey Block About March 1

A new hardware store to be conducted by Albert Staley and Ernest Staley, brothers, under the name of Staley Brothers, will be opened in the Emrey Block about the first of March, this coming year.

They will occupy about two-thirds of the first floor of the building, the other being used for the office of Kinsey & Buys, Charles H. Emrey in charge. A general line of hardware and accessories will be carried.

The senior member of the firm, Albert Staley, needs no introduction to the people of Charlevoix. Up to two years ago he was connected with the Charlevoix Hardware Co., in whose employ he had been for a number of years. Ernest Staley, the junior member of the firm, has been a resident of this vicinity for years residing a greater part on his farm across the Arm from Ironton.

Both are young men and fully capable of carrying through to a successful issue their new venture.

ALIMONY IS KEPT UP UNDER PRESENT LAW

Figures from County Clerk Show Increased Efficiency

Figures obtained from County Clerk Chas. H. Emrey, show that the new system of handling alimony moneys through his office has resulted in increased efficiency in this department since the new law went into effect four years ago.

The amount handled by the county clerk has increased each yeur as follows: 1923, $1,479.30; 1924, $2,398.90; 1925, $3,488.00, 1926, up until December 10, $4,546.04; total $11,912.24. Under the former law, alimony payments were made direct to the wife or dependents and no record was kept by the court. Consequently many paymeats were missed and allowed to fall in arrears before the matter was brought to the attention of the court. Under the new system the county clerk makes a statement to the circuit judge at each regular session of court and offenders are soon brought "onto the carpet."

Judge Parm C. Gilbert has given this important matter very strict attention and the above figures speak for themselves. Efficiency in alimony collections is a decided asset to the county. If such payments were not enforced, the county poor comaission would be called on to carry the burden.

KAZOO WON FAST GAME WEDNESDAY

INDEPENDENTS LOSE AFTER FOUR OVERTIME PERIODS

Girl's Independent Team Walked Away From Sophomores—Newago Here Wednesday Night

The Charlevoix Independents and the Western State Normal of Kalamazoo furnished one of the fastest and most exciting basketball games witnessed here in many years last Wednesday evening at Hooker's garage.

Charlevoix started the game with a squad of second stringers and Kalamazoo got away to an early lead. Before the first quarter ended Buchea, Hallett, Coleman, Jones and Todd took the floor and from then on the game was a merry one. The first half ended with the score 3 to 4 in Kazoos favor. The game seesawed throughout the final half and ended with the score a tie, 9-9. Four 5-minute overtime periods were necessary before the visitors won by a two basket margin.

The first overtime period resulted in both making a field goal. Two scoreless periods followed. Charlevoix missed a chance to win when Buchea missed a free thruw allowed on a foul called just before the whistle blew to end the third period. Kazoo came back in the fourth period and sunk two field goals, giving them the game 15 to 13.

The girl's Independent team, composed of teachers and some former graduates of the school scored an easy victory over the C. H. S. girl's sophomore team, 32 to 2 in the preliminary game. The basket shooting of the Misses Thomas and Mary Lemieur featured, along with the splendid team work of the rest of the squad.

Another fast independent game is promised when the locals meet the Newaygo Portland Cement Company team here on Wednesday night of this week. A number of other games have also been booked by the Independents for later in the season.

MORE ABOUT THE NECKTIE GAME

"PAWNEE BILL" HAS WORKED THROUGHOUT STATE

Michigan Tradesman Has Reviewed Scheme to Dispose of Ties—What to Do

The Michigan Tradesman in a recent issue carried the following story about the necktie game of a St. Louis man who mails out the ties with a request for payment or ties back:

Saginaw, as well as most every city of Michigan recently received through the mails a flood of knit ties, none of which had been ordered by the recipient. The same talk was used with the exception that a stamp was enclosed for the return of the merchandise if you did not remit. The sender was represented as being a blind man and after looking over some of the ties, we are very thankful that we are not afflicted with blind tie men in Saginaw. We are most fortunate in having a group of reliable retail merchants who handle ties in Saginaw.—Saginaw Credit Bureau.

The Better Business Bureau of St. Louis, furnishes the following information concerning the blind man above referred to which can be accepted by all as authentic:

The activities of this gentleman have been the source of much local comment and numerous inquiries. Complaint was made to the Bureau that he was backed by Jacob Karchmer, a well-known local promoter, who has previously been in difficulty in connection with promotions exploiting the blind, as well as other enterprises using a "charity" appeal. As a result of our activities in endeavoring to learn if anyone is benefiing by his merchandise scheme, other than himself, "Pawnee Bill" at one time authorized us to state to all enquirers that he was not in need of nay charity, but he was in fact, doing very well, and that he would consider the elimination of all reference to his affliction in future literature. Because of the time which has elapsed since the last statement, and lack of evidence thereof, we assume that he has decided not to eliminate the "blind" appeal.

As a matter of principle this bureau is opposed to the sending of unordered merchandise through the mails. A good many of these requests are accompanied by literature which is, apparently, an appeal to charity. While there may be many worthy cases, yet it is very difficult to determine where needed assistance ends and excess profits begin. Our experience shows that this country is literally flooded with these requests.

A recipient of unordered merchandise is under no obligation to perform the labor required to place the merchandise in the mails for return to the sender. It is sufficient that the merchandise be kept in a safe place for a reasonable length of time so that it may be handed to a personal representative of the company should such a representative call and ask for the return of the merchandise. The recipient should not use the merchandise because its use would signify acceptance of the order. No doubt, the failure of recipients to return merchandise except upon personal call, would have a tendency to discourage the sending of

OVER FORTY PRESENT AT MEN'S CLUB MEET

John Lake of Petoskey, Spoke on "Making Good Americans."

Forty or more men met in the Methodist Episcopal church parlors last Monday evening for supper, good fellowship and program. After the excellent feed Rev. C. E. Pollock gave a stereopticon talk on the Nativity, showing a large number of select views copied from the great works of art that deal with the early life of Christ.

He then introduced Mr. John Lake of Petoskey, who spoke on the subject, "Making Good Americans." He emphasized five essentials for this in the home, public school, church, child nurture and good companionships. The address was full of practical values. The orchestra was at its best, and was greatly appreciated.

Next Monday evening the special speaker will be Dr. R. B. Armstrong. A Swiss steak supper will be served. It promises to be a red letter event for men. The hour is seven o'clock.

BUSINESS AS USUAL IN CHINA

The political and military news from China varies strangely from the business news. For years that vast country has been in the throes of a civil war. An imperial dynasty has been swept awny. The most populous nation on earth has turned democratic. First there has been revolution, then rebel leaders fighting among themselves and dragging millions into the scope of their warfnre. Yet ns an American observer remnrks:

"Meanwhile business in the Orient is but little nffected, and the ense with which a nation of 450,000,000 peuple is adjusting itself to an epoch-making revolution is astonishing."

It would be more astonishing if Chinese society were organized like our own, which depends much on government.

Our organization is primnrily political. We put government first, and give it large powers over our economic nnd social activities.

The Chinese have little political aptitude or interest. In most of their industrinl, commerciol and social activities, they pay little attention to government. Industry and trnde have their own laws and sanctions. Fnmilies nnd communities are governed largely by custom and tradition.

Local rulers may wield power, but the national government, where its hand is felt, is regarded usually ns an interloper. The Chinnman considers governmental authority or taxes as a necessnry nuisance, pays whnt he is forced to pay and does what he is forced to do, and goes his own way. Business proceeds regardless of political successions, elections and wars. Citizens shrug their shoulders at the troops, and go about their own affairs.

Some time the Chinese may unite and act collectively and purposefully in politics or war. But so far there is little hint of any such possibility.

Boys' and Girls' Club Work Enlarged

The winter of 1926-27 starts off with a large increase in membership in both the sewing nnd handicraft club projects and if a good start menns anything, Charlevoix county will enjoy its most successful year in club work.

Without a single exception these various clubs, organized early in November by extension specialists from the State Club Department, have already made rapid progress in carrying out their requirements and are deeply interested in the work. This year great emphasis was placed in having 100% finishers in each club and as a result those who were uncertain were not asked to join and it is hoped our percentage of finishers will be considerably higher than last year.

Great credit must be given to the leaders of the new clubs, who are donating their services and efforts unselfishly and without compensation to give these rural boys and girls instruction and trnining in sewing and manual training. Following nre the various clubs in the county:

Sewing Clubs

1. Chaddock School Club, East Jordan. Leader, Miss Vera Belding, teacher; members, seven.

2. Busy Bee Club, Boyne Falls. Teacher, Mrs. Corn Willis: leader, Miss Mary Benjamin; members, five.

3. Clarion Club, Clnrion. Leader, Miss Frances Bryant, teacher; members, eight.

1. Keep Working, Hilton school, Charlevoix. Leader, Miss Lottie Webster, teacher; members, nine.

5. The Merry Sewers, Mountain school, East Jordan. Leader, Miss Frances Gould, teacher; members, seven.

6. Busy Folk's Sewing Club, Wildwood school, Boyne City. Leader, Miss Margnerite Schepers, teacher; members, six.

7. Bay Shore Club, Bny Shore school. Leader, Miss Helen M. Germond, teacher; members, nine.

8. Cheerful Workers, Burgess school, Chnrlevoix. Teacher, Miss Irene Bruce; leader, Miss Rnber; members, eight.

Handicraft Clubs

1. Phelps Handicraft Club, Phelps school, Charlevoix. Leader, Russell Duffey, teacher; members, seven.

2. Wide-a-Wake Club,—Burgess school, Charlevoix. Teacher, Miss Irene Bruce; leader, Sims Baker; members, twelve.

3. Busy Builders, Korthase school, Boyne City. Leader, Miss Celia Mae Howe; members, seven.

4. Clarion Hammerfnst Club, Clarion. Leader, W. C. Palmer; members, eight.

5. Be Finishers, Hilton school, Charlevoix. Teacher, Miss Lottie Webster; leader, Orville Hilton; members, five.

This gives a totnl of 98 boys and girls who have started the winter club work in the county. In addition n group of live boys in the Chaddock school are endeavoring to complete their requirements without n suitable place to work and without a leader. Working under these handicaps they nre to be congratulnted for their interest and spirit.

CHAPTER XVII

The End of a Great Search

Lydia returned to her college work on Monday after the junior prom, a little thinner, and her color not quite as bright as usual, but in a most cheerful frame of mind. She was feeling, somehow, a new sense of maturity and contentment.

Kent was devoting a good deal of attention to Lydia but this did not prevent his taking Margery about. He was, he explained to Lydia, so sorry for her!

"You don't have to explain to me," protested Lydia. "I want you to go with all the girls you like. I intend to see all I want of as many men as care to see me. I told you this was my playtime."

Kent's reply to this was a non-committal grunt.

It was late in May that he told Lydia what John Levine had finally accomplished, in his silent months of work in Washington. The Indians on the reservation were to be removed bodily to a reservation in the Southwest. This reservation was then to be thrown open to white settlement.

"What will poor Charlie Jackson say?" were Lydia's first words.

Kent shrugged his shoulders. "Poor old scout! He'll have to make a new start in the West. But isn't it glorious news, Lyd? The land reverts to the government and the land office opens it, just as in pioneer days. Everybody who's title's in question now can re-enter under settlement laws. Isn't Levine a wizard! Why don't you say something, Lydia?"

"I don't know what to say," said Lydia. "I'm sick at heart for the Indians. But I'm glad that the awful temptation of the pines is going to be taken away from Lake City. Though how good can come out of a wrong, I'm not sure. When will Mr. Levine come home?"

"Next month."

On a Sunday afternoon, late in June, John Levine turned in at the gate as casually as though he had left but the day before. Lydia was inspecting the garden with her father, when she heard Adam bark and whine a welcome to some one.

"Oh, there he is, daddy!" she cried, and she dashed down the rows of young peas, her white skirts fluttering, both hands extended.

John seized her hands and for a moment the two stood smiling and looking into each other's face. Except that he was grayer, Levine was unchanged. He broke the silence to say, "Well! Well! young Lydia, you are grown up."

"It's my hair," said Lydia, "and my skirts."

The two men clasped hands. "Well, Amos?"

"It's been a long time between drinks, John."

"I know it, Amos, but my chore's done. Now, I'll stay home and enjoy life. Lydia, is it too hot for waffles and coffee, for supper?"

"It's not too hot for anything on earth you can ask for," returned Lydia, beginning to roll up her sleeves. "I'll go right in and start them now."

It was an extraordinarily pleasant supper. After the dishes were washed, Levine asked Lydia to stroll up the road with him while Amos did his evening chores. If was dusk when they turned out the gate to the road, Lydia clinging to John's arm.

John put a long, hard hand over the small thin one on his arm. "Have you missed me, young Lydia?" he asked.

"Yes," she answered, "especially as you never came near me after the hearing."

"How could I come?" asked the man, simply. "You had weighed me and found me wanting. Have you forgiven me, Lydia?"

"It wasn't a matter between you and me," replied the girl, slowly. "It was between you and your conscience and if your conscience approves, what's the use of asking me to forgive you?"

"Because, I can't stand not having your approval," said Levine.

They strolled on in silence, while Lydia considered her reply. "No matter if the destroying of the Indians were right, that wouldn't exonerate the whites for having been cruel and crooked in doing it. People will always remember it of us."

John sighed, then said abruptly, "Let's never discuss it again. What are you reading now, Lydia?"

"English essayists and Emerson. I'm crazy about Emerson. I learned one thing from Friendship to quote to you. It's like you and me."

She quoted: "'Friendship—that select and sacred relationship that is a kind of absolute and which even leaves the language of love suspicious and common so much is this purer; and nothing is so much divine.'"

John stopped and, taking Lydia's face in both his hands, he exclaimed huskily, "Oh, my dear, this is my real welcome home! Oh, Lydia, Lydia, if you were ten years older and I were ten years younger—"

Lydia laughed. "Then we'd travel—to all the happy places of the world. We must turn back. Daddy'll be waiting."

Levine was very busy with the details of the Indian removal for the next week or two. The exodus was accomplished in a businesslike manner. There were some disturbances on the reservation, but for the most part, the Indians were dazed and unprotesting. Before the concentration began, the precaution was taken of sending Charlie Jackson under guard to his new reservation in the Southwest. Lydia had never seen him after her day at the hearing. She always was to carry in her memory, his handsome brouze face, too early marked with lines of despair, as she saw it while she uttered her protest to the commissioners. And it was a hauntingly sad memory to carry.

In the evening Lydia sat with her Emerson open before her, but with her unseeing eyes fastened on the open door. It was a little after nine when the chug-chug of Kent's car stopped at the gate and in a moment Kent, white faced, appeared in the door.

"John Levine's been shot. He wants Lydia!"

Without a sound Lydia started after Kent down the path, Amos following.

Started Back Toward Town at Break-neck Speed.

Kent pecked them into the little car and started back toward town at break-neck speed.

"How bad off is he?" asked Amos.

"Can't live," answered Kent. "That d—d sister of Charlie Jackson and old Susie both took a shot at him, just as the last carload was finished. The police and the militia got 'em right off. Shot 'em all to pieces."

"Where is John?" asked Amos.

"In Doc Fulton's office. They can't move him."

No one spoke again. Kent brought the automobile up with a bang before the doctor's house and Lydia, followed closely by the two men, ran up to the door, through the outer office to the inner, where a nurse and Doc Fulton stood beside a cot.

Levine lay with his face turned toward the door. When he saw Lydia he smiled faintly. She was quite calm, except for her trembling. She walked quickly to his side and took his hand.

"Looks like I was going to start traveling alone, young Lydia," he said feebly. "I just wanted to tell you—that Great Search—is ending all right—don't worry—"

"I won't," said Lydia.

"Only I hate to go alone—my mother—gimme something, doc."

The doctor held a glass to his lips. After a moment, Levine said again, "My mother used to hold me—" his voice trailed off and Lydia said suddenly:

"You mean you want me to comfort you like I used to comfort little Patience?"

"Yes! Yes!" whispered Levine. "It's going to sleep alone I— Mother—"

Lydia knelt and sliding her arm under Levine's neck, she pulled his head over gently to rest on her shoulder. Then she began with infinite softness the little song she had not uttered for so many years.

I've reached the land of corn and wine
And all its riches surely mine
I've reached that heavenly, shining shore
My heaven, my home, for evermore.

Suddenly the nurse shifted John's head and Doc Fulton lifted Lydia to her feet. "Take her home, Amos," he said.

John Levine had finished the Great Search.

* * * * * * *

Curiously enough, nothing could have done so much toward reinstating Lake City in the good opinion of the country at large as did Levine's tragic death. There was felt to be a divine justice in the manner of his taking off that partook largely of the nature of atonement. He had led the whites in the despoiling of the Indians. For this the Indians had killed him.

That a white life extinguished for a tribe destroyed might not be full compensation in the eyes of that Larger Justice which, after all, rules the universe, did not seriously influence the reaction of public opinion toward thinking better of Lake City. And John Levine, known in life as an Indian graft politician, became in his death a statesman of far vision.

After her first wild grief had expended itself, Lydia found that, after all, Levine's tragic death had not surprised her. She realized that ever since she had known Charlie Jackson, she had been vaguely haunted by a fear of just such an ending.

Billy, trundling up the dusty road from the law office on his bicycle, late each afternoon, would stop for a moment or two.

"The drought is something frightful," he said to Lydia one afternoon in late August, wiping the sweat and dust from his face. "Are you feeling any more cheerful, Lyd?"

"I shall always have a gap in my life, where he went out," she said, slowly. "I shall never get over missing him. Oh, he was so dear to me! And yet, Billy, it isn't at all like Patience's death. He didn't depend on me and I didn't live with him so that everything doesn't cry his absence to me. And I've got more resources than I had then—"

She laid her hand on the open book in her lap.

"What're you reading?" asked Billy.

"Emerson—Compensation. Listen, Billy—'We cannot part—with our friends. We cannot let our angels go. We do not see that they only go out that archangels may come in.'

"And so," Lydia's voice trembled, but she went on bravely, "I'm trying to understand—trying to see how I can make something good come out of his poor lost life. Somehow I feel as if that were my job. And—and the idea helps me. Oh, my dear John Levine!"

The two young people sat staring at the distant hills.

"Don't you see," Lydia burst out, "that I've got to do something, be something, to make all the loss and trouble of my life worth while?"

"I understand," answered Billy.

Early in September, John Levine's will was found. He had left his entire property, unconditionally, to Lydia.

Amos, at first, was frantic with delight. Lydia was appalled.

"All my life," she half sobbed to her father, "I've been fighting to get away from Indian lands. And Mr. Levine knew how I felt. Oh, how could he do this to me!

"Don't talk like a fool, Lydia!" roared Amos.

"But don't you see how I feel?" cried Lydia. "Don't you see that all John Levine's lands up there are haunted by death—his own—and all the starved Indians? Oh, why did he do this to me! I won't have it, I tell you! I'd rather be poverty stricken all my life."

"Well, don't worry too much about that," said Kent. "Dave Marshall thinks there won't be anything left after the estate is settled, but the Indian lands."

"Oh, Kent, you aren't having anything to do with Dave Marshall, are you?" exclaimed Lydia.

Kent flushed a little. "Well, his advice can't hurt me. If it's bad, I don't have to take it. You ought to go out and see his farm, Lydia. They're getting the house all fitted with modern conveniences. Dave's going to make a model stock farm."

"Bought with money earned by the Last Chance!" said Lydia.

Kent looked at her quizzically. "A New England conscience must be something awful to own, eh, Lyd?"

Lydia chuckled. "It's pretty bad," she admitted, then she went on soberly, "but I won't take these Indian lands."

"You can give them to me," said Kent, cheerfully.

"She'll keep them," said Amos, shortly, "or Lydia and I'll have our first real row."

Lydia looked at Kent thoughtfully. Since the day under the willows, he had not made love to her, yet she had the feeling that Kent was devoted to her and she wondered sometimes why he liked to spend as much time with Margery as with herself. Then she gave herself a mental shake.

"I'm going to tell you right now, that until I have to, I'm not going to worry. I'm going to try to be happy in my senior year."

Overdoing?

Hurry, Worry and Overwork Bring Heavy Strain.

MODERN life throws a heavy burden on our bodily machinery. The eliminative organs, especially the kidneys, are apt to become sluggish. Retention of excess uric acid and other poisonous waste often gives rise to a dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning perfectly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. More and more people are learning to assist their kidneys by the occasional use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Ask your neighbor!

Have We Reached The Danger Line in Taxation?

AMERICAN railroad taxes are mounting to new Alpine heights this year, the latest estimate for 1926, being that they will aggregate somewhere between $400,000,000 and $420,000,000, which may be expressed in various ways, although meaning the same heavy load:

That they will average from $1,005,800 to $1,150,675 a day.

That they will involve a charge per hour between $45,659 and $47,945.

That from six cents to six cents and four and a half mills out of every dollar taken in will go towards taxes.

That the railroads in 1926 will have to devote more than the net earnings of one mile out of every four for the payment of taxes.

The national government has cut down the national debt from January 1, 1920, to January 1, 1926, by about $4,250,000,000—four and a quarter billions.

In the same interval, the debts of state and local governments have increased by about 6¾ billions—$6,750,000,000.

During this period of federal debt reduction, the state and local governments have been incurring obligations 20 times as fast as they paid off the old debt. During this same period, debts of state and local governments combined have been incurred 4½ times as fast as they were before the war.

The total public debt of all forms of government in this country is higher than at the peak of the war debt in 1919.

The national debt is being reduced at the rate of three quarters of a billion dollars a year—$750,000,000.

State and local debt is being increased at the rate of more than a billion and a quarter dollars a year—$1,250,000,000.

From January 1st, 1920, to January 1st, 1926, national government expenditures were reduced about two billion dollars—$2,000,000,000.

During the same period current expenditures by state and local governments increased more than two billion dollars a year—$2,000,000,000—and they are still increasing.

Rising taxes are one of the initial moving forces of the vicious circle of rising costs. Labor asks for higher wages, Producers and distributors pass along the accumulating burden to swell the family budget of the ultimate consumer. This, too, involves higher rents (or home ownership cost), higher food, fuel and clothing costs, etc.

After all, railroads are like any other industry. The farmer does not look forward to his tax bill with more anxiety than does the railroad.

Have we not reached the danger line?

Is it not time to retrench state, county and local expenditures?

"Joanna," an Edwin Carewe-First National production, based on a newspaper serinl by H. L. Gates, starts a showing next Wednesday and Thursday at Palace Theatre. Dorothy Mackaill and Jack Mulhall appear in the featured roles.

Skyrockets's Course Similar to Students'

A few months ago, a student at the University of Kansas was bent on the aequisition of a degree in journalism. Today he is about to take part in several of the screen's biggest productions.

Such is the skyrocket career of Charles Rogers a student of the Paramount Pictures School, who was recently signed to a long term contract by Jesse L. Lasky, first vice-president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation.

Rogers has been a member of the school since June, 1925. When its first term was completed, the Paramount Junior Stars were cast in "Fascinating Youth," a picture which comes to the Palace on Saturday and Sunday. Rogers was given the role of "Teddy Ward," the central figure. Under the direction of Sam Wood it is said that he has more than justified the confidence of Paramount officials.
